MME. AMY SHERWIN, Mr. FRASER GANGE, AND PARTY.

GREAT SUCCESS AT MANCHESTER, SATURDAY, DEC. 10.

Manchester Guardian says:

MADAME AMY SHERWIN and Party gave an excellent concert on Saturday evening in the Free Trade Hall.

Manchester Courier says:

MADAME AMY SHERWIN, of course, is a well-known artiste, and her excellent method and pure voice were heard to advantage in Arne's "Polly Willis" and Handel's "Ombra mai fu."

MADAME ZELA, a brilliant soprano from New Zealand, surmounted the difficulties of Ambrose Thomas's "I am Titania" with ease; her voice is of good quality and range, she articulates clearly, and her rhythmic sense is well developed.

MISS DOROTHY WEBSTER sang in a sympathetic and graceful manner.

MR. ROBERT PERCIVAL has a full tenor voice, and temperament capable of expressing fine dramatic feeling.

MR. FRASER GANGE.—One wonders where such a fine baritone as Mr. Fraser Gange has been hiding his voice: though this may be his first visit to Manchester, we cannot but believe we may hear him often in the future, for not only has he a beautiful voice under perfect control, but he has, in addition, a temperament that without effort can compass the gamut of the emotions from broad humour to the subtle suggestions of tragedy. Mr. Gange is made of fine "stuff," both temperamentally and vocally; he may hope to gain an enviable position as a singer.

For Terms and Valid Dates apply to MADAME AMY SHERWIN, 213, Regent Street, W.

PLAY ALL YOUR NEW MUSIC AT FIRST SIGHT.

Do you have to practise your new music over and over again before you can play it satisfactorily? That should be unnecessary. It is so easy to acquire the ability to play new music at first sight. Only 15 minutes' daily practice is required—but my method is the only one which will give this result.

Successful students testify to the unfailing success of the System.

The following is an extract from a recent letter:—

"I should like to convey my sincerest thanks for the thorough way in which you have carried me over the difficulties of sight-reading; also my appreciation of your System, which I consider to be nothing short of marvellous. When I compare my sight-reading now with what it was six months ago, also my piano-playing generally, I feel that I cannot speak too highly of your System. A. F. A."

MR.

CHARLESWORTH GEORGE

(BASS-BARTONE)

is open to accept Engagements for

ORATORIO AND BALLAD CONCERTS.

Dec. 2, 1910.

"I have much pleasure in stating that Mr. Charlesworth George took the part of Samuel in the oratorio of 'King Saul' when it was performed at Huddersfield, on October 28, 1910, and that he sang it with admirable intelligence, spirit, and dramatic insight." C. HUBERT H. PARRY.

MORNING POST.

Mr. Charlesworth George's singing was notable for his good articulation, but to this virtue he adds the natural gift of a baritone voice of considerable resonance and useful quality, and sufficient technical skill to leave him free to follow the dictates of his temperament. He showed a suitable appreciation of each item of the well-varied programme chosen for performance. His readings of airs from operas by Mozart, Massenet, and Verdi, and a number of short songs, placed his capacity for interpreting their meaning beyond doubt, and his phrasing of the air "Vision Fugitive" alone was sufficient to establish his claim to musicianship. Mr. S. Liddle was the accompanist.

STANDARD.

Mr. Charlesworth George's voice is a bass-baritone of a fine resonant quality throughout, and he sings with a sincerity and dramatic insight that should serve him in good stead should he ever decide to turn his talents to the interpretation of opera in English. Both Henschel's "Young Dietrich" and the "Credo" from Verdi's "Otello" showed Mr. Charlesworth George to be a singer who has the capacity of expressing himself intelligently, forcibly, and convincingly.

COURT JOURNAL.

There is something more than the makings of a fine artist in Mr. Charlesworth George. His voice is not only of a grateful and equable quality throughout, but he sings with a dramatic intuition and nervous force that cannot fail to be of very material service in the future.

A. C. MACKENZIE.

(Op. 30.)

STANDARD.

The performance of Sir A. C. Mackenzie's choral masterpiece in its revised form will doubtless assure it a fresh lease of life among choral societies.

MORNING POST.

The changes made by the composer have been directed to the elimination of redundant portions, with a general compression of the work and the provision of an entirely new final portion. The result is a distinct gain to a composition which from its first hearing has always won acceptance for its beauty and its colour. . . . In its new form "The Rose of Sharon" provides a work whose charm and vividness is likely to win for it and its composer a new reputation. . . . It provides an Oratorio of a just degree of difficulty and with an amount of actuality that is likely to cause its complete acceptance.

MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.

The new and revised edition should revive its popularity . . . a new and telling chorus ends the first scene of the second part, "The Temptation"; and the final part, "The Reunion," has been effectively re-written.

GROVE'S DICTIONARY OF MUSIC.

The publication in 1910 of the fifth and last volume of the new edition of Grove's 'Dictionary of Music and Musicians' was the most important literary-musical event of that year in the English-speaking world. There exists no other work in our language dealing with musical matters with which this great dictionary can be compared. The five volumes of the new edition, the first of which was issued in 1904, comprise nearly 4,000 pages, which contain about 4,000,000 words contributed by 184 writers.

The first four volumes were reviewed in the Musical Times as follows: vol. i., January, 1905; vol. ii., April, 1906; vol. iii., April, 1907; vol. iv., August, 1908.

Sir George Grove originated the idea of compiling the Dictionary, and acted as its editor; hence its association with his name. The first volume was issued in 1879, and the fourth and last volume a few years later. The four volumes contained 3,125 pages. An Appendix was issued in 1889. Sir George Grove was born on August 13, 1820, and he died on May 28, 1900. A portrait and a sketch of his life appeared in the Musical Times for October, 1897.

The editing of the new edition was entrusted to Mr. J. A. Fuller Maitland, M.A., the well-known musical critic of The Times. Mr. Maitland was born in 1856, and was educated at Westminster School and Trinity College, Cambridge. He is the author of numerous works on musical subjects. In another issue this year we hope to give a full sketch of his useful career.

The new volume, which commences letter T (all the volumes exhaust a letter, and therefore each begins a letter), does not contain many articles of first-rate importance; a fact for which the end of the alphabet is responsible. The best-known composers dealt with are Tchaikovsky, Wagner, Weber and Verdi, and the two Wesleys of course come in for notice. Many of the articles are simply reprints from the former editions, with corrections and occasional expansions. A most obvious general criticism, already advanced against the preceding volumes, is that some articles are disproportionate in length in view of their subject-matter. This point is considered later on. Of all the newly-written articles, that by Mrs. Rosa Newmarch on Tchaikovsky (spelt Tschaikowsky in many quarters) is the ablest and most interesting. No one living was better fitted than this penetrating critic to give a sketch of Tchaikovsky's career and an estimate of his achievements. The article fills thirty-one columns, and a complete list of the composer's works takes up another column. The story of the conception and purpose of the 'Pathetic' symphony (No. 6, in B minor) is eloquently told. The idea came as Tchaikovsky was starting for Paris. He says, to his nephew: 'The programme symphony (as he termed it) is penetrated by subjective sentiment. During my journey, while composing it in my mind, I frequently shed tears.' Later he says, 'Without exaggeration I have put my whole soul into this work,' and he declared that it was the best thing he ever had composed, or ever should compose. In her critical survey of the composer's works, Mrs. Newmarch remarks of the songs (117 in number) 'that a comparatively small portion are of really fine quality. The chief defect of his instrumental writing, the repetition and development ad nauseam of an idea which is too thin to bear such over-elaboration, is even more obvious in his songs.' The article concludes with the following general estimate:

If Tchaikovsky does not bear a supreme message to the world, he has many things to say which are of the greatest interest to humanity, and he says them with such warmth and intimate feeling that they seem less a revelation than an unexpected effluence from our own innermost being.

His music, with its strange combination of the sublime and the platitudinous, will always touch the average hearer, to whom music is—and ever will be—more a matter of feeling than of thought. Therefore, if we must pose the inevitable question: How long will Tchaikovsky's music survive? we can but make the obvious reply: As long as the world holds temperaments akin to his own: as long as pessimism and torturing doubt overshadow mortal hearts who find their cry re-echoed in the intensely subjective, deeply human music of this poet who weeps as he sings, and embodies so much of the spirit of his age; its weariness, its disenchantment, its vibrant sympathy, and morbid regretfulness.

The article on 'Touch' (by Sir Walter Parratt) is reprinted without alteration from the original edition. If additions had been made, no doubt there would have been some reference to Mr. Tobias Matthay's elaborate book on 'The act of touch.' One of the most valuable articles in the first edition was that by Sir Hubert Parry on 'Variations.' This is retained verbatim, and a brief note by the editor mentions the contributions by Sir Hubert and of Sir Edward Elgar to this attractive form. The long notice of Verdi (by Signor Mazzucato) is also reprinted in full, but with additions by the editor. Another long and extremely interesting article on the Violin family, running to fifty-four columns, is compiled by Mr. E. Heron-Allen from the original article by Mr. E. T. Payne.

The article on Wagner was contributed to the old edition by the late Edward Dannreuther. At the time it was written, it was one of the best succinct accounts of the great composer's life and works. But in the 20th century the perspective of time might have suggested some later views. The only additions made to the original article are bibliographical, and are by Mr. Herbert Thompson. It may be interesting to many, more familiar with the music of Wagner than with his views on composition, to read that, after a concert at the Albert Hall (1877), he said:

I am not a learned musician; I never had occasion to pursue antiquarian researches; and periods of transition did not interest me much. I went straight from Palestrina to Bach, from Bach to Gluck and Mozart—or, if you choose, along the same path backwards. It suited me personally to rest content with the acquaintance of the principal men, the heroes and their main works. For aught I know this may have had its drawbacks; any way, my mind has never been stuffed with 'music in general.' Being no learned person, I have not been able to write to order. Unless the subject absorbs me completely, I cannot produce twenty bars worth listening to. . . .

In instrumental music I am a Réactionnaire, a conservative. I dislike everything that requires a verbal explanation beyond the actual sounds. For instance, the middle of Berlioz's touching scene d'amour in his 'Romeo and Juliet' is meant by him to reproduce in musical phrases the lines about the lark and the nightingale in Shakespeare's balcony-scene, but it does nothing of the sort—it is not intelligible as music. Berlioz added to, altered, and spoilt his work. . . .

Whenever a composer of instrumental music loses touch of tonality he is lost. . . .

When occasion offered I could venture to depict strange, and even terrible things in music, because the action rendered such things comprehensible: but music apart from the drama cannot risk this, for fear of becoming grotesque. I am afraid my scores will be of little use to composers of instrumental music; they cannot bear condensation, still less dilution; they are likely to prove misleading, and had better be left alone. I would say to young people, who wish to write for the stage, Do not, as long as you are young, attempt dramas—write 'Singspiele.'

The ample notice (80 columns) on Weber, contributed by Dr. Philip Spitta to the first edition, is retained in full. It is no doubt too long relatively, but it would have been an ungrateful task to maltreat such an excellent piece of work.

A new article on Welsh music by Mr. Frank Kidson raises some controversial points that have already been discussed in our columns by Mr. D. Emlyn Evans, under the head of 'The New "Grove" on Welsh Music' (November, 1910, page 711), and Mr. Kidson returns to the charge in an article already in type, but which we hold over to our next number.

In the Wesley numbers the anthem 'All go to one place' is, as in the former edition, still ascribed to both father and son instead of to S. S. Wesley only.

There are forty-five articles under the letter Z, and the last in the volume is on 'Zwischenspiel,' the German name for interlude or entr'acte.

The volume includes an Appendix of 68 pages in which numerous corrections are given and omissions repaired. No fewer than thirty-three British musicians not hitherto mentioned in the Dictionary are accommodated with niches in the temple of fame. The following is a complete list:

H. P. Allen, Frederic Austin, Hubert Bath, Arnold Bax, W. H. Bell, York Bowen, Frank Bridge, Percy Buck, A. von Ahn Carse, John Coates, Benjamin J. Dale, John David Davis (deceased), Thomas Dunhill, Gervase Elwes, Henry Farjeon, James Friskin, H. Balfour Gardiner, Nicholas C. Gatty, Percy Grainger, Clement H. G. Harris (1877-1897), Hamilton Harty, Gustav von Holst, John McCormack, Edward W. Naylor, T. Tertius Noble, Norman O'Neill, Roger Quilter, Daniel Rootham, Cyril B. Rootham, Charlton Speer, W. H. Speer, Barclay Squire, Richard Terry.

Frederick Delius, too, comes to his own in a sympathetic appreciation written by Mr. R. A. Streatfeild. It is stated that after a performance of his 'Over the hills and far away,' at Elberfeld, Dr. Haym, the conductor, was summoned before the Town Council and threatened with instant dismissal if he ever ventured again to perform music of such a character at a municipal concert! Mr. Streatfeild says:

Delius stands, as it were, midway between the two schools into which the world of modern music is divided—the subjective, of which Elgar's symphony is a recent and characteristic product, in which music is used to express the composer's own thoughts, feelings, and aspirations; and the objective, the members of which seek in the world around them a motive for their art. Much of Delius's music is confessedly pictorial, but it is something much more as well. It is less a painting of nature herself, than a study of the influence of nature upon the human soul. Delius views nature, not with that 'innocence of eye' which was one of the catchwords of the early impressionistic painters, but in the light of his own temperament, and it is the blending of the psychological with the pictorial element that gives to his music its peculiarly characteristic quality.

The recent compositions of some of the foremost British composers—Parry, Elgar, Stanford—are duly chronicled, but those of one of the most prominent and fertile in the land, namely, Granville Bantock, are unintentionally overlooked. We say this advisedly, because obviously there can be no suspicion of any other reason for withholding information which it is the primary purpose of the Dictionary to provide. In another column (p. 21) we are glad to be able to give the called-for supplementary list.

Twenty-two pages of the Appendix are devoted to the tracing of the evolution of about thirty old songs, all more or less of the folk-song type, regarding some of which, as our columns this month testify, it seems difficult to ascertain the truth. In dealing with such music, Mr. F. H. Kidson brings his exceptional knowledge to bear, and the result is very interesting. A new article on the tuning of bells, by Mr. W. W. Starmer, also deals with its topic authoritatively.

Naturally a work of this comprehensive scope, making its appeal not merely to those who do not know, but also to the 'lynx-eyed circle of those who do know, has evoked considerable criticism. It would have been miraculous if its four thousand pages and registration of innumerable details contributed by 184 writers had been free from many errors. Mr. Maitland's task was undoubtedly a difficult one, and in view of all the circumstances attending the preparation of the new edition, every fair-minded critic must admit that its achievement proves that it was placed in highly competent hands. Mr. Maitland has enjoyed unique opportunities of becoming practically acquainted with music of all schools and periods, and he unites with all these advantages a broad outlook and the art of terse, lucid and interesting literary expression. It would be hard to say who there was in the country better equipped for the task. With this appreciative feeling, we sought and obtained an interview with Mr. Maitland, the substance of which we now proceed to give.

First it must be borne in mind that the work undertaken by Mr. Maitland was a new edition of Grove, not a new Dictionary. He wished at first to alter the scheme and compile an Encyclopædia of Music, and to relegate the three great articles on Beethoven, Mendelssohn and Schubert, which are monuments of the infinite care and insight of Grove, to separate publication. But it was happily decided to retain them, as it was recognised that they were some of the most attractive features of the original work. Balance was therefore practically destroyed at the outset, for it was impossible to regulate the length of all other articles to fit those of Grove. The new editor had to accept a situation and not to create one. The same problem was presented in not a few other cases. There were many monographs on topics and composers which had been compiled with great care and skill, and which provided information, albeit not always of great importance but often not easily discoverable elsewhere. To have maimed these faithfully and laboriously collected data, or to have padded other articles with needless information, would have been an absurd devotion to arithmetical simple proportion measured by numbers of words. Take the article by J. H. Mee on Steibelt, about whom it must be confessed no one to-day is likely to rave, and it might be said that if it had been omitted it would never have been missed. Yet it is an excellent piece of work, and provides for all time all anyone is likely to want to know of this musician. On the face of it there seems an astounding incongruity in apportioning thirteen columns to Steibelt and only eighteen to John Sebastian Bach and his works. But the explanation is that in the one case information is not easily available and in the other it is. Why was the article on Harmony not added to? Has not the whole-tone scale played some part in modern development, and has nothing else happened since Sir Hubert Parry wrote the profoundly interesting article on this topic which appeared in the original edition, and which is reprinted verbatim in the new edition? The answer here is that the author was too busy to be asked to re-write this and other articles, and that they were already a fairly complete survey of the subjects they dealt with.

In the preface to vol. i., the editor makes fully clear the general plan of the new edition. As to the inclusion and exclusion of names—a most difficult matter to decide—he says:

In the new edition, as in the old, no attempt has been made to include the name of every musician who might be held to deserve mention. There is the less need for such an exhaustive treatment (in regard to English musicians, at least) since the publication of British Musical Biography, and other works of the kind, which claim to mention everyone of any kind of eminence. The average country organist who, though unknown beyond his own parish, has succeeded in getting an anthem printed, will not find his name in the new edition of the Dictionary any more than in the old. The process of selection may not in all cases meet with universal approval; but it has not been done without careful weighing of the claims of each name, whether among executants or composers. In regard to the younger musicians, particularly executants, only those have been admitted who have attained to real eminence, and whose fame has spread beyond the limits of their own countries.

How far criticism is desirable in a dictionary, especially of living composers whose rank in the world of music is not yet determined, is a moot point. It is difficult to give an account of the works of a composer without deviating into criticism, which must necessarily be the reflection of individual opinion. The case of Richard Strauss is a crucial one. Mr. Maitland recognises the power of his much debated compositions, but he is incredulous as to his invariable seriousness of purpose. Mr. Maitland invited a well-known and able musician to deal with this elusive composer, but the proposed contributor declined the task after hearing 'Salome.'

The new Grove needs no defence. It imperatively claims the grateful thanks of all English readers. Whatever its faults, it is not too much to say that it is the greatest work on music in the English language.

HOW MODERN SONG GREW UP.

By C. HUBERT H. PARRY.

[The following is the text of a lecture given by Sir Hubert Parry at Reading University College on November 9.]

Many people still seem to think that songs consist of tunes with sundry instrumental appurtenances which are called the accompaniment, and which are of no great consequence except to show when the singer is out of tune. Such people are probably unaware that the same tune sounds quite different when it is accompanied by different harmonies, and that a comic song can be made to sound like a hymn-tune without any great expenditure of harmonic ingenuity. In reality the meaning of melody is, in many cases, so indefinite that the same tune can be wedded to words with quite different meanings without a suspicion of inappropriateness, as was often done in old folk-lore ballads. Melody alone is length without breadth, and however much it may please the initiated as well as the uninitiated, it takes time to deliver its message. Harmony, on the other hand, is capable of conveying decisive meanings almost instantly; and when it is combined with tune it can give and enforce its meaning also decisively. But it is not only by harmony that tune and melody can be made to have different meanings; and composers have been ceaselessly endeavouring to enhance and extend the expressive power of melody by the discovery and use of all sorts of devices in every branch of art, and these devices have been especially fruitful in the department of song.

The object of composers has mainly been to make the relation of their music to the poems or lyrics set more complete and more vivid. The story of song is much the same as the story of the greater forms of art, and indeed of all art in general; which is also a mirror of the story of progress in human life. Composers are always exploring and trying to add to their resources. They are always trying to find out new chords and new successions of chords, new effects and combinations of colour, new uses of rhythm, new forms of melody, new types of ornament, new modulations. It stands to reason it must be so. A composer does not want to compose what somebody else has composed before, however often he does it by oversight. He wants what he says to be new and his own, just as a poet wants his poem to be new, and the novelist wants his novel to be new. And the effect is to be always expanding the territory of music, by passing from the known to the unknown. The way in which the territory has been expanded is almost comically obvious and natural when one comes to examine it; and the reasons for the particular courses adopted by composers are as clear as the reasons for particular courses adopted by the two little parties which set off to discover the Antarctic Pole and the Southern magnetic Pole, as so vividly presented to us in Sir Ernest Shackleton's book. The principle on which progress is generally described as being made is 'along the line of least resistance': it might also be described as being achieved by overcoming each difficulty that presents itself in the simplest way that will prove effectual. The ideal pole towards which composers have been striving was to find all the resources of art which might be available for expression; and also—and that is a very important matter—to develop means and principles of organization to such a pitch of elasticity and variety, that the rhythmic, metric and elocutionary intentions, and even the psychological schemes of the poets could be reproduced in the music without mangling and disarranging the sentences and periods. For such purposes the primitive idea of a tune must of necessity be inadequate. It may fairly be said that if a tune really fitted several verses of a poem it must be, in respect of the music of language, rather a poor poem. The true composer of songs sets poems because he believes in them, and because they inspire him; and when he finds that the longs and shorts and accents of a poem do not exactly coincide in different verses, he tries to find some way of making his music fit. All other types of composers, including the commercial, can be left out of consideration.

We are fortunate in having a fairly complete view of the story. We have to acknowledge that we hear of polite solo singing early in the 15th century, but it does not bear upon artistic solo singing any more than do the still earlier solo songs of the Troubadours and Trouvères. For our purpose it is sufficient to go back to the beginning of the 17th century, when composers were giving their minds ardently to what they thought was a new kind of musical art, the object of which was to enable individual singers to sing poems instead of reciting them. They called this new departure 'Nuove Musiche,' and one of the foremost of its advocates, Giulio Caccini, published a book about it in 1602, and appended musical compositions, including some of his own solo songs, which are among the earliest examples of art-song as distinguished from folk-song. It is obvious from these examples, especially 'Fere silvaggie,' that Caccini concerned himself very little with the idea of making a tune. He wanted to do his duty by the poem, and, the resources of art being very slender, he was content to find an indefinite but agreeably melodious passage which fitted sufficiently closely to the words to justify their being sung instead of spoken—and beyond that he merely furnished a single row of notes in the bass with indications by figures of what chords the accompanist was to play. Such an accompaniment serves no purpose whatever, except just to support the voice and supply a sense of form; and it is most significant by what it lacks. True, the accompanist is told what chords to use, but he has nothing to inform him in what position he is to put them. If he happened to be in a mischievous frame of mind, there is nothing to forbid his playing the chords in the right-hand three octaves away from the bass, and making mock of the composer. In later times men discovered that the same chord could be made to sound quite different if its component notes were differently distributed; and that the colour and expressive meaning of chords could be made to have very subtle relations to the mood or emotion of the poem and its moments by the way in which they were spaced out. But this was very far off as yet; for it was not for a long time that composers found it worth while even to indicate the exact notes of the chords which were to be played. This of itself shows how slight was the artistic scope of the early solo songs. The voice had all the responsibility and the accompaniment hardly counted for anything.

Yet even at such a stage there was a good deal of scope for variety of treatment, and different attitudes of mind produced different results. This is most easily perceived in the effect of different bias in different nations. The differences of preponderating national temperament come out with surprising clearness in spite of the very limited range of artistic method. The impressionable Italians always took great delight in vocal melody. They did not care much for dance music or rhythmic music, and, indeed, in the light of later history, they seem to have cared very little about the words to which the music was set. It was left to the northern nations, not so innately musical, to care a great deal for them. And in this connection it is strange and suggestive to recall that the Italians, in spite of their love of melody and their natural aptitude for music, have never produced any great song-writers. Perhaps it was their excessive love of vocal melody which made them inapt to solve the problems of song! The bias of the French has been very different. From earliest days we hear of Mascarades; and Mascarade is only a courtly name for ballet. The French, with a consistency truly wonderful, have always maintained their preference for music which interprets rhythmic motion, and for those types of tune which are rhythmic and compact, and neatly designed. The charming little French Chansons of the early part of the seventeenth century, such as those of Guédron, superintendent of the music of Louis XIII., are nearly always of that type. They generally deal with dainty and pretty sentiments, which are daintily and dexterously set. The deftness of organization is very noteworthy, because the French have an extraordinary taste for exact and obvious organization in all things; and their music is a confirmation of their general attitude of mind.

The attitude of English song composers has been quite different; and, moreover, it was slow in revealing itself. They have always been inclined to come to music through ideas which are external to it. Until recent times they have hardly ever been happy or at ease in pure, wordless music; and have been most successful when they have used music as an interpreter and a reinforcement of the ideas which the words, especially in fine poems, convey to them. It is curious and suggestive that, at the time we are considering, the most delightful of song-composers, Thomas Campion, was at once poet and composer, and equally delightful in both capacities. It must further be admitted that his songs are very tuneful. Tunefulness was not confined to him either in those days. The genial Thomas Morley, and Ford, and Farnaby, and even the subtle, tender Dowland seem to indicate that it was a trait in the national musical character. It may imply a disposition towards intelligibility and practicalness; clear perception of externals; distaste for rumination and innate energy. The point of their dependence on fine literature is illustrated by the great contemporary reputation of Henry Lawes, a little later than Campion. He certainly was not a great composer at all, and had very little invention or technique. But he had a feeling for poetry of a fine kind, and a sense of the right way to declaim it. His virtues lie in trying to solve the problem in thoroughly English terms. Later composers have often been led astray through applying to the English language inflections which were invented or used by foreign composers for foreign languages. The essence of the finest treatment of the vocal part of a song is to find and use inflections which are inherent in the language set; and this often rather hampers the singers. The ardour of the English people for annexing even the compositions of foreigners has in the past made the task of the native song composer rather superfluously difficult, because singers have been so accustomed to sing songs in foreign languages that they cannot sing in any really effectual manner the inflections which belong to their own. A great deal of interpretation with the average singer is mere manner, and at one time the song composers of this country appear to have succeeded best who reminded the singers of what they had learned to imitate in foreign countries. Fortunately that limitation becomes in these days less and less evident. Lawes was not in danger of any such distraction. He seems unlikely to have enjoyed the influence of much foreign music. He was like a gifted but inexperienced child, with neither models nor technique, trying to enhance the effect of poems which moved him by interpreting the poet's intentions in the matter of accent, elocution and inflection in musical terms, and he sometimes succeeded admirably. But he made no use of harmony to enhance the expression. Purcell, again, though he attained to an immensely higher standard, did not elaborate the accompaniments of his songs, though he used every artistic device available at his time to enhance the expression. His harmonization is now and then surprisingly vivid and pointed, though the chords are not filled in. His intention was characteristically English, in seeking to express and emphasise the meaning and general mood of the words; both in his delightful, genuinely English tunes, and in those solos in the form of free declamatory recitative which anticipated the 'Ariosos' of the Germans in Bach's time, and even the procedure of Wagner and modern musical dramatists.

As long as the interest of the proceedings was mainly confined to the voice, no attempt was made to elaborate and give definite texture to the accompaniment by the use of figuration, such as forms of arpeggio, triplet figures, Alberti bass or any such device. But when the sonata forms became fairly established, conventional formulas came to be used in songs as in the instrumental forms of art. That was the first stage of art in the direction of equalizing the services of voice and accompaniment. A type of song arose which has persisted till our own times, in which the voice has most of the responsibilities of tune or expression, and the accompaniment is just so far made artistically complete that the player has all he has to do plainly set down for him. This was of course a considerable advance on the figured bass system, though the share of the accompaniment in the proceedings was rather small; and the conventional, meaningless character of the passages tended to re-act upon the voice part, and to make that also conventionally tuneful and elegant rather than expressive. The great masters who dealt in this type of song produced beautiful works of art, in spite of not producing much that was vividly characteristic or apt to the vivid moments of expression in the words: Mozart's songs and even Beethoven's early ones fall into this category.

The next stage, and a very important one, was that in which the conventional formulas of accompaniment were displaced by figures that had meaning and relevance to the words. Schubert, without conscious premeditation, frequently adopted the practice of making the figures of accompaniment illustrate the spirit of the poem, thereby enhancing the interest of the proceedings and making the music in general more full of life. In some cases the transition is quaintly simple. For the conventional formulas needed but little alteration to make them characteristic, as may be seen in some of the songs of the 'Schöne Müllerin.' Schubert was naturally led very much in the direction of realistic suggestion, as in a parallel stage Purcell had been. His quickly susceptible mind was specially liable to such influences. He made the passages of his accompaniments suggest ripples and waves and rushing of waters, the roar of the storm, the sound of bells, the rustle of the leaves, the spinning wheel, and such external effects. The externals impress themselves first. And after the objective comes the subjective; in other words, the expression of the inner feelings produced by the externals and the sentiments. Schumann, as an intensely introspective composer, very appropriately illustrated this phase of song. He was a person of great culture and of great literary ability, as well as a composer. To him it was essential that what he set should be of fine quality; and being of fine quality, it inspired him to interpret the meaning of the words in the warmest and richest musical terms. Everyone takes it for granted that in Schumann's finest songs every part of the little work of art ministers to the expression of the poem. Even the initial phrase of many songs, such as 'Ich grolle nicht,' 'Er, der Herrlichste,' 'Du meine Seele,' 'Frühlingsnacht,' would be enough to prove it. He was not disposed towards realistic suggestion, for the warmth and truth with which he could express sentiment and emotion made such devices of identification superfluous. The development of the actual technique of the pianoforte put larger resources in his hands than had been enjoyed by earlier composers, and he used them in a very individual way. Apart from the more elaborate nature of his accompaniments, which often—as, for instance, in 'Im wunderschönen Monat Mai' and 'Nussbaum'—contain independent illustrative ideas, the general difference between Schumann and the earlier song composers consists in a richer, fuller, warmer general tone. At last the point is attained, which has been referred to, of using the distribution of the components of the chords to enhance the character of the expression. In this connection it may be observed that there is a general tendency in music for the tone to extend in both directions, and different composers affect different parts of the scale. Flimsy, excitable and showy composers affect the piccolo, and serious and deep-feeling composers love the deeper sounds. Schumann and Brahms, and other finely emotional modern composers, especially delight in fullness of sound, which is obtained by enriching their harmonies with component notes low down in the scale; the former loving the fifth next to the bass, and Brahms even giving a sense of rugged sternness by putting the third next to it. In such matters a new factor of importance presents itself: for the spacing out of chords is one of the ways in which effects of colour are obtained. It bears an analogy to the distribution of the harmonics, which makes the scientific basis of difference of quality of tone in the single notes of various instruments. It led the way in the profuse cultivation of colour effects which is such a striking feature of modern music; to which composers are devoting so much of their energies that they seem sometimes to be in danger of losing sight of other factors in the scheme of art which are of quite equal importance. This ardour to excite highly-wrought sensibilities by subtle colour-effects is especially notable in recent French composers, who most fully illustrate the latest phases of the art of song-writing in many conspicuous ways. They certainly emphasise the view of composers of songs that it is not their business to provide tunes. Many of their songs talk excellently, and the treatment of language is as deft and dexterous as it was in the chansons of two hundred years ago. The family likeness is indeed remarkable; but they do not affect tunes. Indeed, one of the most singular features in French song music, in song as elsewhere, is the use of a kind of monotone recitation, a whole group of syllables being frequently sung on one note. This is probably derived from peculiarities of language and the metric principles of French poetry, and would be less suitable in other languages. It gives a certain lightness and ease to the general procedure, which is quite in accordance with the French attitude of mind towards art. The French song composers are also very skilful in devising characteristic figures of accompaniment, though the figures seem to be devised more for effect than for expression. They also illustrate profusely a new phase in the story of development of very great importance, which is the use of modulation as a means of colour and expression; and their adoption of this expedient coincides with similar experiments in the works of German song composers.

In the earlier phases of song, modulation counted for very little, except to define the form. Even far into the Romantic period, songs were generally laid out on very simple principles of design with well-marked periods representing definite keys. That was the last stage in which formality showed itself. Beethoven in other branches of art found out what a powerful means of interest and expression lay in surprising and unexpected modulations; and Wagner, in his music-dramas, applied the discovery with a freedom and insight which sorely scandalized the preachers of propriety. The latest song-writers have carried the procedure to the utmost lengths. With them the old theory that music requires to be clear in tonality in order to be intelligible has quite gone overboard. They frequently tumble out of their key in the very first musical phrase they utter; and they slip out of C major into F sharp major without compunction at any moment, if the effect illustrates the spirit of the poem or ministers to the interpretation of the immediate sentiment of the words. And it must be admitted that the device is most effective when it is justified by the words set. But such procedure begets obligations. The developed mind demands reasons for everything from the point of view of form or organization, as well as from the point of view of expression; and the startling modulation which grips the attention as a just stroke of expression has also to be justified as a factor in the organization. In other words, when the hearer, who hears with his mind as well as his ears, is enchanted by some new modulation, his curiosity is aroused also to see how the composer gets it into its place as a factor in the art-work as a whole. If the interest of the proceeding is not maintained, the isolated stroke sticks out all by itself and throws all the rest out of gear. So the employment of these devices of modulation vastly complicates the duties of the composer, and also makes his productions interesting from a new point of view. Just at present the eager and restless repudiation of precedent in art, as elsewhere, seems to be pressing on too fast, and to be sometimes inducing anxiety as well as interest. But the break-up of the old ideas about tonality is too conspicuous to be gainsaid. The principle which it represents must be welcomed—where it is understood in all its bearings by the composer himself—as a very subtle means of enhancing the expression and interest of the music. Moreover it is one of the most valuable of the many resources which have been devised to enable composers to bring their music more closely into touch with the lyrics they set. Nowadays composers do not resort to the feeble subterfuge of repeating words and sentences in order to make their music fit, not to the metric scheme of the poet but to some preconceived idea of what musical form must be. Now the composer pays full respect to the metric and elocutionary intentions of the poet, and rejoices in making his musical form an exact counterpart of the spiritual and textual form of the poem. He makes the musical side of the song completely satisfying as a musical work of art without getting at cross purposes with the form of the words. The extraordinary variety of resources which have been developed gives a song composer ample choice to adopt one of many courses which will keep him absolutely in touch with the poet, without failing to make the music, as music, intelligible.

The story of the growth of song is really quite simple if we look back to it. It began with melodious vocal passages, the accompaniments to which were of no significance at all. Then art was brought into the accompaniments by using conventional figures which were appropriate to the accompanying instrument: then the conventional figures were transformed or displaced by figures which had meaning; then colour was introduced into the accompaniments by making use of the various qualities of harmonies in different positions, and by applying the development of the technique of the pianoforte to obtain greater richness and variety of sound. And, finally, modulation was converted from mere key-to-key procedure, which gave the effect of definite design, into a phase in which it became a powerful means of expression and also of elasticity in organization.

It may be added that art spreads its net wider as it gains in resources. In the beginning songs dealt with comparatively few subjects, and love had rather an excessive share in the attention of poets and the musicians who set their poems. But as men's sympathies widen, the subjects of art grow more comprehensive. All sorts of situations and all phases of human experience interest human beings; and music, enriched with many resources, can deal with any of them. In literature men have been deeply interested in such a recondite subject as the temperamental condition of tramps, as so captivatingly displayed in W. H. Davies's 'Super-tramp' and Stevenson's 'Vagabond'; and we find the subject very cunningly presented in music in Dr. Vaughan Williams's setting of the latter.

The ideal principle which underlies the whole process of development may be shortly summed up as the distribution of functions in proportion to fitness, which applies to all human activities whether of art or business. The instrument which nominally accompanies is capable of doing certain parts of the art-work which the voice is not capable of doing. As a mere matter of fact, the instrument is capable of doing a great deal more than the voice, and in modern songs the accompanist often has a much harder task to accomplish than the singer. To be just, it would often be more fair to describe the singer as accompanying the man at the pianoforte. Yet the interest must centre in the singer, partly because the singer is responsible for the words and the elocution, and—which sounds absurd—the singing. The instrument is responsible for the design, the consistency, and all that part of expression which belongs to harmony and the rhythm. The voice must be free in the sense that it cannot reiterate figures, but must follow the sequences of the verbal phrases and their intent. The instrument is free to unify the whole by reiteration of characteristic figures, or to give a sense of design by the distribution of harmonies and keys. The uncomfortable word 'specialization' seems to be hovering unfortunately in the mind. Art often shows the most subtle and delicate adjustments of physical laws, which come about without men being aware of what they are doing. Composers were not aware they were apportioning functions on the basis of fitness, but when they had arrived they found that such adjustment was implied. They have worked out these problems unconsciously, and the result of centuries of devoted concentration in effort to enrich the resources of expression is one of the most interesting and satisfying of all the forms of modern art; and the knowledge of how it grew up may help us to appreciate the vagaries as well as the masterpieces of our own time.

A SCHOOL FOR MUSICAL CRITICS.

BY ERNEST NEWMAN.

Some recent numbers of Le Courier Musical have contained the report of a paper on 'La critique musicale, ses devoirs, sa méthode,' recently read by M. M. D. Calvocoressi to the students of the Ecole des Hautes Etudes Sociales. M. Calvocoressi is himself a very thoughtful and well-informed critic, and everything he had to say on this subject is well worth reading. The occasion itself was interesting. Among M. Calvocoressi's audience, apparently, were some students who might possibly take up some day the profession of musical critic, and it was to these that the lecturer more particularly addressed himself. Why, one reflects, should we not have the same opportunities of tuition in criticism as in singing or pianoforte playing? Why should the critic, of all people, be allowed to take up important public work without any special training for it or any evidence of his competence for it? The longer any critic with his heart in his work follows his craft, the more conscious does he become of the difficulties of it, and of how much better he would have been for some skilled guidance in his early years. In every other art the student profits by the discoveries of all who have gone before him. He does not have to discover for himself the laws of counterpoint, or the best way to make his fingers flexible and obedient; he is placed in possession of a certain fund of knowledge that has been accumulated by the labours of generations, and all he has to do is to assimilate it and make it the starting-point for his own individuality. The critic alone has not only to build his house but make his own bricks and find his own straw. He has, of course, the writings of great critics to go upon. But the young composer or the young painter has the music or the pictures of the great masters to go upon, yet we do not regard these as sufficient in themselves without a regular course of technical training. He might, if he were very wise, very patient, and very thorough, distil out of them the essence of musical or pictorial technique; but the very object of education is to save the student's time and labour by giving him the distillation direct. Would it not be all the better for a musical critic if he could have his early steps guided as those of the painter or the composer or the pianist are? There are obvious difficulties in the way, of course. Few young men, just entering upon criticism, take their profession seriously enough; and if they did, and were willing to work as hard at the groundwork of their profession as the young dentist or lawyer works at his, there would be the difficulty of finding a teacher able and willing to instruct them. It will be a long time before we have classes for criticism established in our conservatoires. Pending this, the best thing that can happen to a young critic is to be understudy to an able older man, who has learned something by his own errors and his own practice in general, and may, by a word or two of advice, save his junior from wasting himself in similarly turning the key in fifty doors before he comes to the one right lock.

It will be said that as criticism is the expression of a man's own knowledge and temperament, no advice from another is likely to be of any use to a man with the real thing in him; while if he has not this, advice can only make a mere echo of him. But the same argument would apply to composing or painting. We do not refuse to put a young composer under a teacher because the latter may prove in the end to be a smaller personality than the former. We let our Beethovens learn all they can from our Albrechtsbergers, and then show themselves, if they have it in them, that they are the Albrechtsbergers' superiors. What really makes a man great is of course born in him; the object of education, in a case of this kind, is simply to clear the tracks and oil the wheels, and give the greatness the best possible opportunity for a good run. Will anyone who has practised musical criticism for any length of time deny that a young man with a real critical gift would be all the better for a few years' coaching by someone who had had a wide experience of criticism and had thought seriously about its problems? For problems there are, problems more subtle than anything that double or triple counterpoint can present. The very fact that critics differ so radically over this composer or that, or this performance or that, is a testimony to the haphazard way in which criticism is conducted. These differences of opinion do not, as is commonly alleged, invalidate criticism; they merely invalidate the critics who are wrong. Medicine and surgery are not invalidated by someone contending that prussic acid is the elixir of life, or that the medulla oblongata is in the knee. Painting is not invalidated by a colour-blind man saying that grass is pink. Nor is the matter settled by saying that a critical opinion is a purely personal affair. The commonest facts confute that glib theory. There are tens of thousands of aesthetic judgments in which every one agrees—for example, that Bach is greater than Mendelssohn, or that Beethoven's ninth Symphony is a better work than his 'Battle of Vittoria.' These are simply critical opinions of the same kind as those we are called upon to pass every day of our lives. Why should not a critic be as right about a symphony of to-day as about a Beethoven symphony? M. Calvocoressi, rather weakly as it seems to me, distinguishes between what a critic may be positive about and what he may not; he is to be 'impersonal and decided' when he is sure that he is announcing 'facts,' and to 'employ the first person and make explicit reservations' when he only 'puts forward his own opinion.' Is the distinction a workable one? At what stage did the 'opinion' of some contemporary of Beethoven that the ninth Symphony was a great work pass from the domain of 'opinion' into that of 'fact'? Every critical judgment that we now call a 'fact' was an 'opinion' at one time. The opinion became a 'fact' simply because it was right; and why should not a critic be right from the commencement? If his knowledge of a new work is ample, and he has thought a good deal about it, why should he not express himself as confidently about it as he would about a work fifty years old? Unfortunately he cannot always get to know a new work so well as this; it may not be published. In that case he will be wise not to criticise it adversely at all, unless it is obviously the work of a weakling or an imitator. No criticism of great works of art can hope to endure unless it is founded on full knowledge of them. And if we were to hold a court of inquiry into the causes of the discrepancy of critical opinion upon a big new work, we should find that it was capable of very easy explanation. Some critics would not know the work at all; others would be debarred from taking an unprejudiced view of it by some constitutional bias against music of this type; and so on. Nine-tenths of the discrepancies of which the enemies of criticism like to make so much would be proved to have no significance whatever.

Now what the individual critic has to do is to be always holding this court of inquiry upon himself. When he sees other men blundering because they plainly do not know enough of the work they are criticising, he must ask himself whether he is always as sure as he ought to be of his own ground when he condemns. When he differs fundamentally from a critic of undoubted force, he must try to find out from what the difference comes. Only one of them can be right; and it is evident that that one is most likely to be right who can explain his opponent's opinion in terms of some general bias or limitation of judgment. If a man's whole writings, for example, show him to be deficient in this or that quality of the musical imagination (for it has very many qualities), we may justly argue that his opinion upon a work that is the product of the kind of imagination he is insensitive to is no more valid than an objection to a painting of grass would be by a man with a constitutional dislike for green. If our desire is to attain rightness of judgment, we must always be testing our own opinions and those of others by applying broader and broader principles to them. For it must be remembered that at the back of apparently the most instinctive judgment there is a general principle of some kind. The trouble is that at first we are all apt to think our own general principles the right ones. We shall best cure ourselves of this conceit by tracing the judgments of others to their sources—or, on the other hand, an inquiry of this kind may rightly confirm us in our own opinion. Every critic who thinks at all about his work is more and more impressed, as he gets older, with the necessity of at once broadening and refining his faculty of judgment, of making it less haphazard, and of trying to understand what it is in the constitution, the training, or the knowledge of other men and of himself that makes them differ from him. He cannot alter them, of course, but he can correct his own most obvious deficiencies when he realises them. When he sees another critic blandly condemn a work of art for not conforming to this or that æsthetic canon, when the latter is obviously insufficient or inapplicable, he will ask himself whether his own critical practice is not sometimes vitiated by the same tendency to take a purely personal criterion for a universal one. He will, in a word, try to educate his faculty of judgment as a painter educates his faculty of seeing, or a musician his faculty of imagining a number of sounds simultaneously. This is by no means the whole education the critic needs: it is only one department of it. The trouble is that he is forced, as no painter or musician is, to be his own instructor—to learn the rudiments of his technique by long observation and personal blundering instead of having a fund of accumulated wisdom to draw upon. And until the critic can go to school as the composer and the performer can, and profit, like them, by what previous workers in the same field have learned, most criticism will remain the haphazard and dogmatic and contradictory thing it is at present.

Occasional Notes.

As already intimated, the centenary of the establishment of the house of Novello & Co. occurs this year. The opportunity of reviewing the history of the firm will be taken in connection with the Musical Times during the year. Amongst the articles to appear in the new volume, Mr. Ernest Newman will give a general survey of some interesting recent Bach research (by Schweitzer and Pirro, Wolfrum, Schering, &c.), and estimates of Liszt (who was born in 1811), Sibelius, and Berlioz. Special attention will continue to be given to Church music and to a chronicle of the progress of music in all parts of the world. As heretofore a feature will be the sketches of the lives of distinguished musicians, both native and foreign. The Editor takes this opportunity of thanking contributors, and of expressing his regret to many others whose proffered articles he has not been able to accept owing mainly to considerations of space. It is not easy for a monthly musical journal, in these days of activity and development, to keep pace with the demand.

Performances on the Continent of important exemplifications of British musical art are sufficiently interesting to justify special record. In another column (p. 21) we announce the coming performance of Sir Alexander Mackenzie's cantata 'The Sun-God's return,' at Vienna, under the direction of the composer. Then at Crefeld, on December 17, where Professor Müller-Reuter has a fine orchestra, a performance of Sir Edward Elgar's Symphony in A flat was given, under the composer's baton. It met with extraordinary success, the members of the orchestra rising and joining in the applause, and giving the composer a 'Tusch,' which is a special mark of appreciation. We are informed that Herr Max Schillings, who was present, invited Sir Edward to conduct a performance of the Symphony at Stuttgart this year.

Mr. G. H. Clutsam's articles on the 'Whole-Tone Scale' (which appeared in our November and December, 1910, issues) have occasioned considerable remark, and have no doubt set many people wondering and thinking; for it must be confessed that even to whole-toners the musical material it provides is fearfully and wonderfully made.

A caustic correspondent writes as follows:

I suppose we ought to thank Mr. Clutsam for the pains he has evidently taken over his articles; but what about the pains they have cost his readers? Does any sane person regard these barbarities he quotes as music? They are the naughty words which we have all used in our foolish youth, and put aside when we came to decent manhood. New! Surely, we know that all possible harmonic progressions were invented before the time of Henry Purcell, and that these are only some of the impossible or discarded ones, which are every now and then resuscitated by would-be composers under the vain belief that if you only cram in queer chords enough you will somehow have a composition. So they stuff in all they know, even down to the studio-sweepings of the past—the clutsam and jetsam, as one might say—but, alas! no composition appears.

A contemporary advertisement offers a prize to the person who can pile together four 'domes of silence.' The attempt would certainly be more useful than piling up six incongruous sounds and calling the result a chord, besides being less annoying to those few who are unlucky enough to possess musical ears. Such are the views of one who was once considered an iconoclast, but is now regarded as

A MERE PEDANT.

Yet it may be answered that we have to reckon with Debussy, who is not exactly a barbarian.

Our Manchester correspondent says:

No one can move about in these Lancashire manufacturing towns without seeing on the hoardings announcements of the oratorios of Haydn, Handel, Mendelssohn, Spohr, and others, to be given in churches or chapels, and not infrequently with soloists of the highest standing like Madame Ada Crossley, De Vere Sapio, and so on. Ten or twenty years ago, probably, these choirs were content with Root's 'Under the palms,' or work of similar quality, but in music, no less than in politics, there are unmistakable signs of great awakening, a pressing onward and upward. If those upon whom may devolve the duty of choosing music for such a public are only faithful to their high calling, and rise at once to the height both of their privilege and their responsibility, the recovery of the love of the finest music among the masses will not be long delayed.

This is cheerful reading, and it is in accord with our own experience; in fact, it is one of our editorial burdens to endeavour to find space to record the innumerable performances that take place. We hope that our numerous correspondents will believe that we suffer many pangs in maiming and sometimes even ignoring the excellent reports that reach us. It may be that many of the organizations that display such praiseworthy zeal are small, but they reflect the pleasure large sections of the community have in making the acquaintance of music as executants.

At the annual dinner of the London district of the Institute of Journalists, held on November 26, Sir Edward Elgar was one of the chief guests, and had of course to make a speech. His plea, as it often is when Sir Edward speaks, was on behalf of popular music, by which is meant the dissemination of good music amongst the masses of the people. It was pointed out that one of the needs of the country was larger concert halls, in order that numbers may be accommodated at a cheap rate. Sir Edward said that he wished that the lighter side of the Art would be looked upon with favour by what he would call the scientific musician. 'People desired to enjoy themselves: let them.' We hope that this means that Sir Edward himself contemplates an exploitation in that direction. He also referred to the advantages derived from the competition festival movement.

The following excellent programme was sung at the second meeting of the 171st season of the Madrigal Society, on December 15:

Our Vienna correspondent (page 37) tells us the curious story of the strike of the Imperial Opera Chorus in that city. It appears that the male members of the chorus adopted the extraordinary course of singing their parts pp in order to call public attention to their rights and wrongs. Perhaps the most surprising sequel was that the audience exhibited no gratitude! Why did not the chorus decide to sing out of tune! Surely that would have been painful; but on the other hand it would perhaps not have been sufficiently novel.

When Sir Alexander Mackenzie was in Vienna as president and conductor of the International Musical Congress of 1909, he interested himself in a fund for the erection of a monument in Vienna to Johann Strauss, 'The waltz king.' He has since formed a small English committee to assist the fund in this country, and has collected the following subscriptions: Dr. F. H. Cowen, £1 1s.; Sir Hubert Parry, £3 3s.; Sir A. C. Mackenzie, £3 3s.; Dr. Charles Maclean, £1 1s.; Mr. Alfred Littleton, £5 5s.

The title-page and contents of Vol. 51 (January to December, 1910), are now ready, and can be had post-free by subscribers on application to the publishers.

'MUZIO SCEVOLA.'

By W. H. CUMMINGS.

In the new edition of 'Grove's Dictionary of Music, we read: 'Mattei, Filippo (commonly known as "Pipo"), a violinist in London, and performer at the operas given by the Royal Academy of Music in the theatres in the Haymarket in the early 18th century. His claim to remembrance is based exclusively on Handel's manuscript conducting score of opera "Muzio Scevola" (which is in the possession of the writer), in which "Pipo" is mentioned as the composer of the first act, usually, and with more probability, assigned to Attilio Ariosti, the second and third being by Bononcini and Handel respectively. See Chrysander's G. F. Handel, vol. ii., p. 56, where the opera 'Arsace, ovvero Amore e Maesta' is attributed to him.'

The only inference to be drawn from the above is that Chrysander considered Ariosti as the composer of the first act of 'Muzio Scevola'; but when we examine the evidence the contrary is found to be the case. Chrysander's second vol., referred to above, was published in 1860, and therein he distinctly says that the first act was by Pippo, the second by Bononcini, and the third by Handel; he further remarks that the 'first act, which under every circumstance was the most important, was given to the celebrated Signor Pippo. . . . A rather weak overture a series of pleasing songs, which are certainly original and have an appropriate dramatic colouring. Pippo closes his act with a short recitative, which could not have been effective. The verdict on his compositions may easily be pronounced: he would have done better to have confined himself to his art as a performer, and left composition alone.'

'Hawkins and Burney know of no Pippo, but give one act to Attilio Ariosti, who could not have been in England at that time.'

The above quotations show the mind of Chrysander in 1860, and turning to the printed score of the third act of 'Muzio Scevola,' published by the Handel Society in 1874, we read the following preface by Chrysander: 'The third act of "Muzio Scevola" was composed by Handel as his share in a musical contest with Bononcini and Mattei; the first act being set to music by Mattei, and the second by Bononcini.'

Further evidence in favour of Pippo, or Pipò, is found in a music manuscript in the British Museum, bequeathed to the nation by Dragonetti in 1846. The very interesting volume is in various handwritings; some pages are by Smith, Handel's amanuensis, and some, I think, in Handel's autograph. The first page has the inscription 'Atto primo Dell' opera Muzio Scevola Dal Sigr. Pipò.' The second act is preceded by the heading 'Ouvverture di L'Atto Secondo della opera Muzio. Sigr. Bononcini.' The overture to the third act is in the hand of a copyist; the original leaves had evidently been lost or destroyed, but this is followed by the title 'Atto Terzo—Opera Muzio composta del Sgr. G. F. Handel, 1721.' This act contains an aria 'A chi vive di speranza,' which is not included in the German Handel Society's publication, but is to be found in 'The favourite songs in the opera call'd Muzio Scevola,' published by Walsh in 1721 or 1722. There are no composers' names printed in this collection; probably it was a pirated publication, no uncommon thing at that period. The opera was first performed on April 15, 1721, at Covent Garden Theatre. Walsh's selection includes Bononcini's overture and four of his songs, one song by Pipò, and three by Handel.

I have compared the Museum manuscript with my own manuscript score of 'Muzio Scevola': a very interesting volume in the original binding and lettered on the back, 'Mutius Scevola M<sup>r</sup>. Handel, Sigr<sup>s</sup> Pipò and Bononcini.' It is reputed to have been Handel's, and from him it passed to Thomas Chilcot, organist of Bath Abbey from 1733 to 1766; it was afterwards the property of Thomas Field, likewise organist of Bath. The three acts are bound together in the order described on the back of the volume. The first act is prefaced with the following: 'Pipò—Overture to Muzio Scevola with several of the songs in that act, with another overture.' This overture is not in the British Museum copy. The second act bears the heading 'del Sigr. Gio:<sup>mo</sup> Bononcini's Act in Mutius Scevola.'

I have noted the fact that the Handel aria, 'A chi vive di speranza,' is omitted from the printed score of the Handel Society, although published by Walsh, and also in the British Museum manuscript; but it is still more curious that my score has an entirely different setting of the text of that aria. Evidently it was a second thought of Handel's, and is an example of the truth of the old adage that 'second thoughts are best.' The melody of the air is very charming, and the accompaniment for flute and strings is noteworthy; the violins are divided into three sets. The violas double the second violins an octave lower; the third violins are doubled in the octave by the violoncelli ripieno, and the score is completed by the violoncelli and contrabassi, whilst the flute doubles the first violins. Handel's autograph manuscript of the Muzio music in the King's library, Buckingham Palace, is dated at the end 23<sup>d</sup> March, 1721, only four weeks before the performance. The libretto of the opera was printed in Italian and English. Handel's own copy, in my library, has been utilized for memoranda by one of his domestics as follows: '12 shifts, 3 aprons, 1 hood, 7 combing clothes, 5 pairs coats 2 have buttons and 2 strings. M<sup>r</sup> Handel.'

Handel's contemporary, Mattheson, of Hamburg, published in January, 1723, a number of his periodical journal, entitled 'Critica Musica,' which contains important evidence. He says: 'As is customary here, on the seventh of this month a new opera was produced under the title "Muzio Scevola." It was sung completely in Italian, but there was a German translation ornamented with a fine Prologue. There are as many composers as there are acts, namely, three. The first was composed by Bononcini, the second by Mattei, who under the name of Pipò (i.e., Filippo) plays the violoncello in the London orchestra. Handel proved his skill in the third act. All these masterpieces have been sent over to us from England, except the Prologue, which is by Kaiser.' Mattheson rightly named the composers, but erred in assigning the various acts.

It will be conceded that the evidence is wholly in favour of Pipò as composer of the first act of 'Muzio'; and it is very desirable that the errors in 'Grove's Dictionary,' under the name of Mattei, and also Ariosti, should be corrected. In the latter case the Dictionary says: 'In 1720 the directors of the Opera made formal engagements for a term with Ariosti, Bononcini, and Handel to write operas in turn for the theatre. It was arranged that the first to be produced, which was "Muzio Scevola," should be the joint work of the three authors, Ariosti writing the first act.'

MR. HADOW'S LECTURE ON CHURCH MUSIC AT THE CHURCH CONGRESS.

By W. G. ALCOCK.

Church music has generally received serious consideration at the meetings of the Church Congress, but the subject, we think, has seldom if ever been so emphatically presented as on the recent occasion when Mr. Hadow read his excellent paper. It would have been difficult to find a musician more fitted for the task, for his critical-historical ability and high musical and artistic ideals are widely known. Both by the structure of his lecture and the illustrations chosen he was most successful in bringing forcibly before his audience the importance of church music, the position it occupies to-day, and the attention bestowed upon it in the past. The subject is undoubtedly entitled to grave consideration now, and will certainly become more so in the near future.

Where once was apathy and indifference, we find young, energetic men thinking and acting seriously, and if we can hardly speak of this growing enthusiasm as the 'new learning,' it may fairly be termed the 're-culture of the old.'

Mr. Hadow takes for his point of departure the year 1544, by which time musical elaboration and technical skill had become so pronounced as to lead to mutilation of the words and so to render their meaning obscure. The publication by Cramer at this time of his Litany was accompanied by a strict injunction that these developments were to cease, going so far as to define the methods of setting words to music in the narrowest and strictest sense. One rule alone, viz.:—that one syllable was to be sung to each note, was enough to bring about a startling change. To illustrate the new methods, Mr. Hadow suggests a comparison between the early works of Tye (e.g. the Westron Wynde Mass) with his post-Reformation setting of the 'Acts of the Apostles,' or Tallis's motet 'Audi Media Nocte' with his Dorian Service. He went on to say that the change was far-reaching and resulted in the introduction of the Protestant form of Psalm tune. Lutheran psalms, though soon suppressed, had their effect, too, in making the way clear for Psalters with tunes, which were published during the reign of Edward VI. Day's Psalter of 1560 was an important work of the kind, to which Tallis contributed.

Mr. Hadow traces the development of church music down to the critical period of the Commonwealth, when all seemed lost. The influence of Pelham Humfrey, Blow and Purcell is noted, as also the inevitable distraction caused by the introduction of orchestral instruments, which had the effect of practically obliterating the glories of choral writing so highly cultivated in former times. But things balanced themselves, and the illustration chosen ('Lord, let me know mine end,' by Greene) showed that it was possible to combine vocal and instrumental ideas in a legitimate manner. The scant recognition given to music in the 18th century undoubtedly checked the art, and Mr. Hadow with true insight says—'the church composers who escaped this [the necessity of satisfying the flippant demands of their patrons] did so at the expense of losing touch with the main course and current of national life.' The works of Croft, Greene and Boyce, fine as they undoubtedly are, and of which the illustration mentioned above is one, are to a great extent 'provincial' and, as the lecturer said, 'no longer at the centre like the music of Byrd, Gibbons or Purcell.'

But other influences were at hand. The addition of pedals to English organs (said to have been adopted in 1790), together with the improvement in organ-building and organ-playing, enabled men like Samuel Wesley (who was at once a fine organist and church composer) to draw together the threads woven by so many, and to produce works which should, in their turn, guide the thoughts of his successors. The visits of Haydn to this country had their effect, if only as counteracting the Handel-worship so prevalent at the time. Nor was Haydn the only foreign influence, for did not Attwood rise, as Mr. Hadow observes, 'almost to the height of his master's serene and celestial melody'? So that Mozart, too, contributed to the varied texture of the music of the time. The reign of Queen Victoria covered an important period of the art, and saw at its commencement what was undoubtedly the lowest general level of English music. Mr. Hadow reviews the work of such men as T. A. Walmisley, Sir W. Sterndale Bennett, Sir John Goss and S. S. Wesley. He rightly deprecates the fact that the two first-named were hindered by official duties from attaining the highest eminence to which their fine gifts entitled them. The name of Spohr must, too, be mentioned as one of influence more or less to be recognised. But it cannot be readily conceded that, as Mr. Hadow seems to suggest, Wesley was unduly affected by Spohr's work. A certain resemblance may be admitted, but far greater strength, which is allowed by Mr. Hadow when he says; 'and yet Wesley is essentially an English composer, using all means and resources current in his time, but holding them together both by the force of his own personality, by his great power of melodic invention, and by his remarkable skill. Hence the combination of massiveness in structure with a certain softness of design.' 'There is never in all his work a cheap effect or a perfunctory passage; the content of his music, even when it is nearest sentimentalism, is always saved by the excellence of its workmanship.'

Mr. Hadow strongly terms the period of church music through which we are now passing as one of 'sheer anarchy,' and is equally scathing when he says 'almost everything written is allowed a hearing.' He claims this unsatisfactory, or rather, shall we say, deplorable, condition of things to be an issue on which the jubilee meeting of the Church Congress may well make a resolution of reform. But there is in many quarters a disposition to consider the vocal music of the early periods as being the only kind suitable for use in church. Surely this would be too drastic and sweeping. The organ of to-day is, no doubt, through the tendency among organists to develop their powers as recitalists, often larger than is actually necessary for the general purposes of accompaniment. But the greater includes the less, and it is not too much to say that stops may be found suitable to all requirements, whatever the size of the instrument. Another cause of irritation is to be found in the desire of many a keen young organist to introduce more of modern instrumental development into his church work than is right or necessary. But, as Mr. Hadow says, 'It is not necessary that we should restrict our music to one style or one idiom.' The list of composers who keep in sight the best traditions, and who are yet able to employ modern methods, is far from being small. One has only to mention such anthems as 'The Lord is my Shepherd' (Stanford), or 'Save us, O Lord' (Baird), or such services as Macpherson in E flat, Tertius Noble in B minor, and Martin in A, as strong evidence that true ideals still exist. The danger lies in the pandering to popular taste, and any unfortunate prevalence of rivalry between choirs. There is, too, the deplorable fact that nearly everyone who can play the organ thinks himself a born composer, with the result that so-called church music is produced, of which the chief characteristic is its utter unworthiness. So many have so little novel to say, and say that little so badly. It is of course easy to make these accusations, but the present state of 'sheer anarchy' gives us every excuse.

Then it may be asked: To what is all this leading us? We know what has been ordered in the Roman Church, and should do all that is possible to prevent similar restrictions in our own, either in individual cases or in what may quite possibly become a more general prohibition, enforced by church authorities as a body. Such a movement would, after all, be but a repetition of what obtained in Cramer's time, and possibly with equal reason. The study of church music of all periods and in all its aspects should constitute part of the training of an organist, without which he must of necessity become too often a mere supporter of showy and meretricious seekers after notoriety and self-advancement. The truly educated will surely pause before giving their thoughts to the world, until they are convinced of their purity of aim and truth of ideal. If the clergy, equipped as they should be with musical knowledge, will insist on having the best, and, of that, only such as is within the means of the musical staff they employ, much will be gained. The 'heartly service' is surely not the highest exercise to which a congregation should be invited, and in these days of the wide culture of secular music, it should not be difficult to direct the reverent attention of worshippers to that glorious heritage of the church which claims it as her own.

PERFORMANCE OF MACKENZIE'S

'THE SUN-GOD'S RETURN,' IN VIENNA.

The second concert of the season of the celebrated Wiener Singakademie (founded 1858), of about 300 voices (hon. president, Prince Max Egon zu Fürstenberg; president, Imp. Councillor Friedrich Ehrbar; vice-president, Angelo von Eisner Eisenhof; artistic director and conductor, Herr Richard Wickenhauser, nephew of Lady Hallé), will take place in the Grosser Musik Vereins Saal on January 13, the programme consisting of Bleye's 'Lerut Lachen' (words by Nietzsche), and Sir Alexander Mackenzie's cantata 'The Sun-god's return.' The composer has been most cordially invited to conduct his work. Soloists, Madame Kiurina and Herr Hubert Leuer, both prominent members of the Imperial Opera.

Church and Organ Music.

THE ORGAN IN DONCASTER PARISH CHURCH.

Much interest has always been attached to this organ, from its great size and variety of tone, and from the fact of its being on one pressure of wind. But modern ideas demanded a purer reed-tone than can be obtained by such means, and though some additions to the mechanical part had been made, bringing the organ under greater ease of control, it was felt that much might be done by thorough overhauling and cleaning. This, with the application of modern tubular pneumatic action, the replacement of the old Solo organ by a new one, the re-voicing of practically all the reeds, together with the provision of varied wind-pressures, would bring the instrument nearer to modern requirements.

The work was entrusted to Messrs. Norman & Beard (of London, Norwich and Glasgow), who, in consultation with Mr. Wilfrid Sanderson, the organist of the church, have carried out the scheme to their well-known high standard. The organ contains 5 manuals (CC to A, 58 notes), and 2½ octaves of pedals (CCC to F, 30 notes). There are 93 speaking-stops and 14 couplers, making a total of 107 drawstops.

* New stops by Norman &amp; Beard, 1910.

The organ was built by Schulze in 1862, the previous organ by John Harris having been destroyed by fire in 1852. In 1864 various improvements were carried out by Messrs. Abbott & Smith, including the installation of a gas engine for blowing purposes, a new console, the application of tubular-pneumatic action to the pedals and drawstops, new pistons, &c.

The following are the alterations and additions effected by Messrs. Norman & Beard :

A new Solo organ of 6 speaking-stops, including a heavy-pressure tuba (8 feet) has been installed in place of that originally transmitted from the Swell organ.

A new large open diapason (8 feet) has been added to the Great organ ; new string stops have been placed in Swell organ, and the swell gemshorn (8 feet) removed to the Choir on the slide vacated by the clarinet, removed to Solo.

No stops have been sacrificed to make the above additions, and the tone of the flue work remains practically the same as left by Schulze, the same having been cleaned and the speech re-set. The reeds, however, have been re-voiced (with the exception of the free reeds, viz., contra posanne 32 ft. and posanne 16 ft.) on wind pressure increased to 6 inches, and harmonic trebles added.

The old tracker actions of the Choir, Solo and Echo organs, and also the lever pneumatic actions of the Great and Swell organs have been replaced by tubular-pneumatic action, and the number of couplers increased.

The Echo organ has been enclosed in a separate swell-box, the shutters of which are controlled by a lever pedal placed on the right-hand side of the pedal-board. Balanced swell pedals have been installed (in a central position) for the Swell and Solo organs, and 3 pistons added to control the solo stops. New tremulants have been added to the Swell organ for both light and heavy pressure winds. The pedal-board is now placed in right relation to the keys, in accordance with the Royal College of Organists' regulations. The blowing arrangements have been augmented to supply the heavy pressure wind for the tuba and to meet the extra demand made on the light pressure wind. The gas engine has been dispensed with, and an electric motor of 10 b. h.-p. installed, which is controlled from the console by a simple reversible switch. New wind reservoirs have been provided for the Solo and Swell organs. The organ contains 5,805 speaking pipes, and about 3½ miles of tubing has been used for the pneumatic work.

RE-OPENING OF THE MANCHESTER CATHEDRAL ORGAN.

Mr. Sydney H. Nicholson, the Manchester Cathedral organist, has recently published an illustrated brochure giving some account of the organs and organists in Manchester Cathedral, from which the following information has been derived :

'Of the earliest organs in Manchester Cathedral we have no records, though the fact that we have a complete list of organists since 1635 proves that some instrument must have been in existence at this period. There seems to have been an organ in the latter part of the 17th century, for an old manuscript in the Manchester Reference Library states that "The old organ having fallen into decay, the present choir organ was made by Mr. Smith, generally known as Father Smith, in 1684." Some time about 1785 a new organ was erected, together with the Father Smith organ, upon the screen, but the builder is unknown. For the Manchester musical festival of 1828 much of this organ was removed, but the Father Smith organ was left in its old position on the screen and was used to accompany the collegiate services. About 1861 it was removed from the screen and was placed in one of the chapels, though not used. In 1891 it was rebuilt, under the direction of Dr. Kendrick Pyne, by Messrs. Wilkinson & Sons, of Kendal, and was placed in the north choir aisle and occasionally used. During the recent rebuilding of the large organ the Father Smith instrument was again moved into the nave, and was used for accompanying all the services for about a year. It has now been placed in the Ely chapel, and it is proposed at some future time to connect it electrically with the keyboards of the large organ, to form the nucleus of an echo organ, so that its beautiful tones may regularly be heard in the Cathedral services. In 1871 a new organ was presented to the Cathedral by Sir William Houldsworth, and was erected upon the choir screen in a case designed by Sir Gilbert Scott. The position was excellent in its acoustic result, but subject to the drawback that, when the singers were seated in the choir and their singing was accompanied by the organ, it was difficult to hear their voices in the nave. Now in the reconstruction the main part has been placed in the choir aisle, but for the purpose of accompanying congregational services a small though powerful section of the organ, under the control of the separate manual, remains upon the choir screen. The organ has been entirely rebuilt and considerably enlarged. Such of the old pipes as were in good condition have been retained, but the organ has been re-voiced throughout. The whole mechanism of the organ, on the tubular pneumatic system, is new, and a new hydraulic blowing plant has been installed. The work has been carried out by Messrs. W. Hill & Son, of London, the original builders of the organ, at a cost amounting to nearly £4,000.

Whoever was responsible for the happy idea of asking two past Manchester Cathedral organists to share in the re-opening services, is deserving of our thanks. It is thirty-six years since Sir Frederick Bridge left for Westminster, and two years ago Dr. Kendrick Pyne relinquished the post. At evensong, on December 12, the service used was Bridge in G, and Sir Hubert Parry's anthem 'Hear my words, ye people,' was performed. A recital by Sir Frederick Bridge followed at 4.30, the Cathedral being crowded in every corner. The programme was not at all a severe one, and had the conspicuous merit of enabling the congregation to get a very good idea of the potentialities of the restored five-manual instrument. Compositions by Bach, Purcell, S. S. Wesley, Schumann, Merkel, and Sir Frederick Bridge were heard at this recital, and probably the Purcell 'Solemn march' and the Schumann 'Sketches' gave the greatest delight. In the evening, Dr. Pyne played a richly varied programme, and, it being the centenary of S. S. Wesley, Schumann and Arne, compositions by these composers were specially included. Organists' interest centred on the C minor Suite by Joseph Bonnet, whose playing was so thoroughly enjoyed recently at the University.

Mr. Sydney H. Nicholson has, in his brief tenure of the post, introduced motets not usually heard in our cathedrals, such as Max Reger's 'Palm Sunday morning' and the two eight-part motets of Cornelius (from the 'Liebe' cycle), 'The surrender of the soul' and 'Throne of mercy,' both of which have been sung during the past month. On Sunday, December 18, a selection from Spöhr's 'Last judgment' was rendered.

TUNDER'S ABEND-MUSIK.

Very successful performances of two interesting and beautiful cantatas by Franz Tunder were given at St. Mary's, Primrose Hill, on the first three Sundays in Advent, this being, it is believed, the first occasion on which Tunder's music has been performed in England, and was until quite recent years unknown even in Germany. The custom of having Abend-Musik arose at Lübeck in the 17th century, in the following manner:—Franz Tunder (1614-1667), the organist of the Marienkirche, 'taking advantage of the fact that a violinist and lutenist were usually engaged to perform in church on the occasion of the official attendance of the magistrates, gradually increased the numbers of the instrumentalists for service on festival occasions, and surrounded himself with a phalanx of efficient violin, viola and trombone players. Out of these small beginnings originated the afterwards famous Abend-Musiken of Lübeck, which took place more especially in the season of Advent.' It is pleasant to record that 'the city granted him (Tunder) successive increase of salary and other advantages, and heartily seconded his efforts.' These performances of chorales and cantatas took place after evensong. Tunder was a pupil of Frescobaldi, in Rome, and the father-in-law of Dietrich Buxtehude, who succeeded him as organist, and to hear whom play, the great Bach himself walked fifty miles. The relationship was compulsory, another curious custom being that the organist-elect, as a condition of appointment, always married the organist's daughter, and Buxtehude's successor, in his turn, married Buxtehude's daughter. The first cantata took the form of a soprano solo, with string and organ accompaniment, based upon the stirring and famous melody, 'Wachet auf.' The second, which was of a more elaborate nature, was woven round the four verses of Luther's great chorale, 'Ein' Feste Burg,' interpreting the old German battle hymn with a wonderful depth and freshness. Mr. Martin Shaw, the organist of St. Mary's, with whom rests the credit of introducing Tunder's music, was the conductor. Mr. Herbert Ferrers accompanied on the organ from Tunder's figured bass. Mr. H. W. Burchett was the solo baritone, Miss Margaret Way, the solo soprano, and Mr. Ewart Baker (who took Mr. Armand's place at very short notice) was the solo bass. The choir of St. Mary's was reinforced by a body of ladies and gentlemen, and by a string orchestra, the leader of which was Miss A. M. Stuart, and Messrs. Breitkopf & Härtel kindly lent the full score of Tunder's works.

MEMORIAL TO THE LATE DR. H. E. FORD.

A stained-glass window has been erected by subscription in Carlisle Cathedral to the memory of the late Dr. Henry Edmund Ford, who was organist and master of the choristers there for the probably unprecedented period of over sixty-seven years (from 1842 to 1909), during sixty-one of which he fulfilled the active duties. The window, which is of Early English architecture, consists of two lights, and the principal figures represented are St. Cecilia and King David, the subordinate subjects depicted being Jubal playing to the shepherds, and Bishop Theodore building the first organ in Canterbury Cathedral, Messrs. Clayton & Bell being the artists. The Lord Bishop of the diocese dedicated the window on Sunday, December 18, before a large congregation, and in his address spoke in feeling terms of the devotion to duty shown by Dr. Ford during his long term of office. A memoir and portrait of Dr. Ford appeared in the Musical Times for April, 1909.

Mr. E. H. Lemare had an unfortunate, and what surely must have been a unique, experience at Middlesbrough recently. His promised recital at the Town Hall, on December 10, had to be abandoned as a result of the failure of the electric power supply. It was then arranged that the eminent organist should stay over Sunday and give his performance on the next afternoon. Again did the refractory but indispensable power deny the eager crowd their pleasure, and Mr. Lemare was compelled therefore to leave Middlesbrough without an exhibition of his unique ability, to the great regret of all concerned.

A movement is on foot for the formation of an association of the organists and choirmasters of Sheffield, and the opinion of those interested is being sought through the local Press. We wish the suggestion may be carried to as successful an issue as in similar cases at Huddersfield and Wakefield, to mention two, of which we have had pleasant experience. Such associations can have but a good effect upon local church music, by the possibilities they offer of intercourse and exchange of ideas. We shall hope soon to hear of the Sheffield Association as an accomplished fact.

This is how the great G minor Fantasia and the fugue in the same key strike an enthusiastic 'annotator':

'This is certainly one of the greatest of all Bach's organ works. Bursting torrents of ornament, imitative episodes, organ recitatives, the boldest modulations and broad resonant progressions of chords—all are here in apparent disorder; and yet the natural genius of Bach presides over it and informs it all. The Fantasia may be regarded as an immense scena for the organ. It opens with a vehemently passionate piece of dramatic declamation, in which a hero is brought before us at some decisive life-crisis. Against massive, irresistible chords the human element dashes itself in vain. . . . The scene changes suddenly. Over the slow, descending arpeggio in the bass a theme of intense pity and sadness is heard, taken up by voice after voice; this quieter mood being succeeded by an outburst of feeling even more violent than before, which in turn gives place to a passage of noble pathos unsurpassed in the realm of art. Thus the music fluctuates between passionate, fruitless striving; the anguish of desperation, and profound pity and resignation—which invariably give place to the first mood of vehement effort and despair. At the end of the Fantasia we are left in doubt as to the outcome of the tragic contest, the sequel to which is contained in this stupendous Fugue. Nothing can resist the giant power of the mighty melody which streams through the work. We feel that a mighty force is marching onward, carrying all before it; and with the glorious conquering, final major chord, we are assured of victory.'

SPECIAL SERVICES.

On Sunday, November 20, at College Street Chapel, Northampton, Gade's 'The Crusaders' was given under the direction of the organist, Mr. R. W. Strickland. Miss Nellie Scrivens, and Messrs. Herbert Kimbell and Alfred Falkner were the soloists.

The annual oratorio service was held in Wells Cathedral on November 23, when Spohr's 'Last judgment' was performed with full orchestra and a chorus numbering over 200 voices. The solos were taken by Miss Viola Salvin, Miss Ethel White, Mr. Perry and Mr. R. A. Grant. The feature of the service was the excellent singing of the choir, which was drawn from four centres—Wells, Shepton Mallet, Street and Wedmore. The conductor was the Rev. Dr. Davis, organist of the Cathedral, and the organist was Mr. E. P. Wheeldon.

At St. John's Church, Ryde, Isle of Wight, on Thursday, December 1, a musical service was given which included Rheinberger's Idylle for strings, and Schubert's 'The song of Miriam.' The canticles were sung to Dr. C. H. Lloyd's setting in E flat, while Sir John Stainer's Te Deum in E flat concluded the musical portion of the service.

The customary performance of Brahms's 'Requiem' was given at St. Paul's Cathedral on December 6, under the direction of Sir George Martin, in the presence of a large congregation. The music of the service opened with Sir George Martin's setting of the 130th Psalm.

The work performed by the Brixton Oratorio Choir at Brixton Church, on December 6, was Gounod's 'Mors et Vita.' Mr. Douglas Redman conducted, and Mr. Welton Hickin assisted at the organ.

Mozart's 'Requiem' was performed in Winchester Cathedral, on December 8, by the Cathedral choir, the oratorio choir and full orchestra, under the conductorship of Dr. William Prendergast. The band and chorus numbered over 200, the former being augmented by members of the Church Orchestral Society and other players drawn from a wide area. Mr. H. R. Eady, assistant-organist, presided at the organ. An outstanding feature of the excellent choral singing was the dramatic attack of the 'Dies iræ.' The quartets were undertaken by members of the Cathedral choir. The hymns 'O heavenly Word, eternal Light' and 'For all the saints,' specially scored for orchestra by Dr. Prendergast, were sung, and Grieg's 'Ases Tod' ('Peer Gynt' Suite) was played. The performance made a deep impression on the large congregation.

At an organ recital given by Mr. Bernard Johnson at the Albert Hall, Nottingham, on November 12, the recitalist varied and improved the occasion by a short explanatory lecture (at the pianoforte) on the more prominent numbers of his programme. The innovation proved entirely successful, the actual performance on the organ being followed and enjoyed by the audience in a noteworthy degree. The scheme certainly sounds well, and must make for the education of any who may not be in the habit of listening intelligently. The programme included Mendelssohn's sixth Sonata, an arrangement of the Andante from Tchaikovsky's fifth Symphony, and the Grand Chœur in D by Guilman.

On Saturday, December 10, in the Concert Hall of the Blind School, Swiss Cottage, N.W., an organ recital was given by Messrs. Hugh Berridge, Arthur Hayhow and Frank Howlett (students of the School), the programme including works by J. S. Bach, Mendelssohn, Henry Smart and W. Wolstenholme. Assistance was kindly given by Mrs. Galsworthy and Miss Margaret Scripps, who contributed songs and violin solos respectively.

The organ of the Temple Church, after undergoing extensive alterations, was re-opened on December 18. We hope to make this the subject of an article in a future issue.

Reviews.

WORKS BY MR. ERNEST AUSTIN.

The Vicar of Bray. Variations for string orchestra. Arranged for pianoforte solo by the composer.

String orchestras are apt to be somewhat neglected by our modern English composers, and any addition to their literature is welcome, especially when it has the artistic value of the above example. Mr. Austin states his theme, the familiar tune of the 'Vicar of Bray,' in his own manner, which seems to fight shy of its original rhythmic regularity, and then submits it to nine variations of varying degrees of fancifulness. The reverend gentleman is shown in many frames of mind, but he preserves his nationality. The final variation depicts a species of race for preference. The Vicar constantly puts in a claim with his characteristic dominant and tonic, but as constantly he is ousted by some other tune that starts with the same two notes, till at last he romps in unchecked with an exhilarating jig. The interruptions are always made, in the orchestral score, by some other group of instruments than that which announces the opening dominant and tonic, a point which necessarily is lost in the pianoforte score. The solo arrangement, however, makes effective pianoforte music throughout, and gives an intelligible idea of the effect of the string version. Where the music exceeds the range of ten fingers, a part is occasionally printed above in smaller type as a kind of optional obbligato, which those who can may include at will.

Shed no tear. Trio for female voices. Poem by Keats.

'Shed no tear' is an agreeable and a singable piece of music: there are no cranky intervals or extreme modulations. It has a graceful rhythm that well fits the accentuation of the words, and the music is generally suffused with a quiet joyousness. The cadences succeed in avoiding the conventional. Perhaps the exigencies of close harmony induced Mr. Austin to make some ventures in this direction.

The Shepherd's love song. A sweet night. A morning song. The music of the wave.

The fact that the first three of the above-named songs by Mr. Ernest Austin are marked Op. 2, Nos. 1, 2 and 3, may explain the use of a simpler style of expressiveness than is associated with the greater number of his works. In the 'Shepherd's love-song,' the pastoral simplicity of the words (which are the composer's) and the music is not of the common kind. In the next example, the opening line of H. Ernest Hunt's poem, 'Sweet night, thy mantle now let fall,' has suggested a soothing flow in the vocal part and a gentle swelling in the accompaniment. 'A morning song,' a setting of words by George Lees, moves in elegant curves of diatonic melody without approaching the commonplace. 'The music of the wave' (words by H. Ernest Hunt) might belong to the same period of composition as the foregoing, as its effects are secured without elaborate figures or harmonies, and without abstruseness.

PIANOFORTE MUSIC.

Prelude and Pavane. Two Idylls. By H. Farjeon.

Spinning song. By Anton Strelezki.

Valse étude. By Sydney Rosenbloom.

[The Vincent Music Company.]

Mr. Farjeon's Prelude and Pavane are slight pieces that might have been 'thrown off in an odd moment.' The former takes about forty seconds to perform, and would stand as a simple model of binary form. The Pavane contains one bar more than the Prelude, but is slow and stately, with several pauses to eke it out. The Idylls belong to a different class of music, in which out-of-the-way harmonies are the hall-mark of merit. They are both short and both original, but their beauty is more affected than real.

The 'Spinning song' hums with the usual trills in the right hand. These, varied with arpeggios, are supported by some not highly inspired chordal progressions in the left hand; and thus the composer avoids the necessity of composing a tune.

Mr. Rosenbloom's 'Valse étude' stands out from the remainder of the present collection of pieces for its fancy and workmanship. It belongs to the type of waltz invented by Chopin, but owes little to that composer in its phraseology. Its one fault is an unsatisfactory scheme of tonality. The initial and final key, A flat, is lost to sight in a protracted middle section, on the same subject-matter, dealing with nearly-related keys. An over-long excursion into B flat near the beginning seems first to throw the key-system out of joint.

SONGS.

To Norah. By E. Douglas Tayler.

Come, dreamless rest. By Noel Johnson.

The requital. By Joseph Holbrooke.

Farewell. Come to me, gentle sleep. By John Pointer.

Sing, Britain's sons. By Charles Harris.

Down Chelsea way. By Henry Coates.

The songster's awakening. The Puritan maia. By Percy Fletcher.

'To Norah' and 'Come, dreamless rest,' are melodious and easily intelligible songs, being simple in character and design. Mr. Holbrooke's 'The requital' is far more ambitious, although there is no lack of simplicity and melodiousness in parts of it. The harmonic scheme of the accompaniment, however, is often involved, and contributes to the picturesqueness of the total effect. 'Farewell' and 'Come to me, gentle sleep,' by Mr. John Pointer, both belong to his Op. 1; they are expressive settings of familiar words in which no recourse is made to elaboration of detail.

Patriotic sentiments are evoked by the next two songs on the list. Dr. Harris's 'Sing, Britain's sons' is in martial rhythm, and has a stirring refrain well adapted to the compass of the ordinary patriotic voice. Mr. Coates's 'Down Chelsea way' calls attention to 'straight old men with the hair of snow, and their martial tread and their coats of red,' with the persuasive eloquence of a catchy tune.

Of Mr. Percy Fletcher's songs, the first, 'The songster's awakening,' is a pretty vocal waltz suitable for light soprano voices. 'The Puritan maid' is a charming light song written to clever verses by Maud E. Sargent, addressed, it appears, to a 17th century portrait.

A Song of Thanksgiving. Sacred cantata for festival and general use. By H. A. Fricker, organist, Leeds Town Hall.

[Robert Culley.]

This cantata consists of nine numbers, most of which are choral. There are solo parts, soprano, tenor, and alto or bass. Two numbers are instrumental. The words consist chiefly of well-known hymns set in anthem or song form. The music throughout is of the practicable kind, and betrays no influence of the late modern school. It is always singable, melodious, and musically, and never austere or oppressively contrapuntal. The organ part, as might be expected, is a very effective feature.

The Walrus and the Carpenter. Choral ballad for schools and classes. Words by Lewis Carroll. Music by Percy E. Fletcher.

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

Lewis Carroll has inspired much music of the lighter kind. Nothing he wrote is more droll than the story of the 'Walrus and the Carpenter,' and it says much for Mr. Percy Fletcher's music that it admirably fits the words. The ballad is meant to be performed without break, and takes about twenty minutes. There are no solos, and the choruses are written in two parts with occasional unison, and generally the music is as simple as it should be for the purpose of schools.

Correspondence.

THE STUDY OF RHYTHM.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

SIR,—It would take too much of your space to enter into details of the differences between the bar and the Greek musical foot, which, for convenience, I have called the 'measure,' and I can therefore only refer those of your readers who are interested in the matter to my 'Rhythm of modern music,' in which I have endeavoured to explain it in non-technical language.

With regard to the value of Greek rhythmical theory in connection with modern music, I am afraid I must continue to disagree with Dr. Trotter in toto. The principles of Greek rhythmical theory are by no means 'exploded,' as Dr. Trotter suggests. On the contrary, they are, I am glad to think, becoming more widely diffused. In 1884, Riemann writes, in the 'Introduction to his "Dynamik und Agogik": "When Rudolph Westphal's "Allgemeine Theorie der musikalischen Rhythmik seit J. S. Bach" appeared in 1880, no small astonishment arose that the rhythmical theory of Aristoxenus (4th cent. B.C.) could be brought forward by a thoughtful philologist as a theory of modern rhythm. And although lacunæ were noticed in this "general" theory, yet it could not be denied that we have much to learn from Aristoxenus, and if incompetent misunderstanding was opposed to Westphal . . . yet there were not wanting those who recognised his meritorious and timely act in founding a theory of modern musical rhythm on the sound basis of ancient theory, and I am glad to have been one of the first of those.'

In the same author's 'Musik-Lexikon,' published in 1905, it is easy to trace the influence of Greek theory in articles dealing with rhythm; and several of the Aristoxenian 'feet' are described and utilised to explain the elements of rhythmical construction. It does not seem, therefore, that Riemann looks upon Greek theory as exploded or fallacious.

I have before me Mathis Lussy's 'L'Anacrouse dans la musique moderne,' 1903. In the glossary of technical terms I read, 'Mesure—Terme de comparaison, l'unité, le mètre avec lequel on mesure la longueur des rythmes, des périodes, des phrases, des strophes, etc., dont une œuvre musicale est composée.' On page 2, 'Les anacrouses jouent un rôle extraordinaire dans la musique; elles sont l'âme des rythmes et, par conséquent, de l'exécution . . . Chantez la Marseillaise sans anacrouses [example given]; vous n'avez qu'un appel sans élan, sans entrain, sans énergie. On dirait un chant émasculé; les Grecs l'auraient appelé hésichastique, c'est-à-dire, calme, religieux. Restituez les anacrouses, aussitôt le chant reprend son allure virile et guerrière, son élan enthousiaste.'

The recognition of the significance of the anacrusis, the portion of a phrase which precedes the first bar-line, is a direct outcome of Aristoxenian teaching.

Dr. Trotter alludes to the first subject of the fifth Symphony, and the first phrase of Beethoven's Op. 26. The first phrase of Op. 26 is a tetrapody, i.e., it contains four 'feet'; or, in M. Lussy's sense, Mesures. The accentuation and the melody rise together, till they culminate in a chief accent and a high note. Beethoven impresses the importance of the chief accent by sforzando. We may play this phrase in an unbroken legato, if we wish, or we may divide it by a cæsura (a break in the legato) into two portions, as Aristoxenus would have done. If we divide it mathematically exactly we shall ruin it. But if we place the cæsura thus :

we cause the second half-phrase to commence with an energetic anacrusis, which adds considerably to the dignity and strength of the phrase. I leave it to your readers to try the experiment, only premising that the anacrusis in the second bar must be joined in strict legato to the first note of the third, and given a very slight crescendo.

I have already occupied too much of your space, so will only allude to the first movement of the fifth Symphony to say that the wonderful energy and strength of the whole is largely due to Beethoven's use of the anacrusis, as here :

Great executants and great conductors feel these things instinctively: lesser musicians may have their appreciation and enjoyment of masterpieces much enhanced by a little definite rhythmical theory, to say nothing of their teaching powers being increased.—Yours faithfully,

C. F. ABDEY WILLIAMS.

'THE ARETHUSA' AIR AND 'HUSSEY'S MAGGOT.'

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

SIR,—In reply to Mr. Kidson's letter on the above, I am sorry that he still prefers his own opinion to that of many distinguished English musicians, as to the Irish provenance of the air of 'The Arethusa.' O'Carolan composed this melody in 1725—or perhaps earlier—and it passed over to England in 1728 or so. Many of O'Carolan's compositions were introduced with the ballad operas of the years 1729-34, and thus his 'Bumpers Squire Jones,' 'O'Rourke's noble feast,' and others became popular. Similarly with his 'Princess Royal,' which was set by other Irish poets to Irish songs before the year 1740, a fact of which Mr. Kidson was evidently unaware. Nor can I follow his view as expressed in the new edition of Grove, that the tune had any connection originally with any English Princess, inasmuch as he himself admits that the tune is named 'Prince William' in Wright's Dances. And I should date the alternative title of 'Princess Royal' as 1733, or perhaps 1734, on the occasion of the marriage of the Princess Royal. It is regrettable that Mr. Kidson should describe the daughter of the Prince of Coolavin as 'an obscure descendant of a long extinct race of kings.' Miss Mary MacDermot (whom O'Carolan styles a 'royal princess') was the daughter of the Prince and Princess of Coolavin, and she married Owen O'Rourke, a descendant of the Princes of Breffin. For this lady O'Carolan composed another song and tune, 'Marie an Cuilfhroin' (Fair-haired Mary). The MacDermots can proudly point to an unbroken lineage of nine centuries, and the late MacDermot, Attorney-General for Ireland, was de jure Prince of Moyburg and Coolavin. Yet it is not so surprising that Mr. Kidson should endeavour to claim such a characteristic Irish melody, for he includes Handel's March from 'Scipio' in his 'English Songs of the Georgian Period'—apparently unaware that it had been adapted by Theobald in 1728, and printed in the first volume of the Musical Miscellany in 1729.

As to 'Hussey's Maggot,' it is undoubtedly an Irish dance tune of the early 18th century, but soon got popular in England, like the Irish tune to which 'Nancy Dawson' was set. The fact of it having been printed under a number of different titles is not at all uncommon. The Irish jig 'Top of Cork Road'—better known as 'Father O'Flynn'—was printed in 1779 as 'Yorkshire Lassies'; and the Irish 'Rakes of Mallow' has been recently published as the 'Rigs of Marlow'!—Yours faithfully,

W. H. GRATTAN FLOOD.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

SIR,—In connection with the revival of a discussion on the old tune 'The Princess Royal,' or 'The Arethusa,' first so ably dealt with by Mr. Frank Kidson in the Musical Times for October, 1894, a traditional Sussex version, which I noted seventeen years ago, may be of interest. The singer, Henry Burstow—shoemaker by trade, but bell-ringer and local songster by choice and fame—was born in 1826. He is of old Saxon stock, and has in the course of his long life only slept six times out of his native town. His father and grandfather, equally attached to Sussex throughout their lives, were famous there as singers of old songs. Henry Burstow learned "Boney's Lamentation" first, at the age of six, from his father. The song sets forth Bonaparte's career up to the time of his abdication only, and was therefore composed in 1814. The tune, sung in spirited march-time, forms somewhat of a link between Rodney's glory, quoted by Mr. W. Grattan Flood in your issue of November last, and some old-printed versions of the 'Princess Royal' or 'Arethusa' tunes. The Sussex version is in regular time (thus agreeing with the best-known printed versions, and also with the many variants noted of later years by folk-song collectors in England), whereas Mr. Flood's air has an irregular fifth bar twice in the first half of the tune, which a little weakens the martial effect of the old air. Will not

Mr. Flood give your readers the source for his tune and words, as this would add much to the value of his interesting comments?

The tune 'To Rodney we will go,' also referred to by Mr. Flood, must be studied in the light of Mr. Kidson's excellent article in the Musical Times for May, 1895. It is recognised by song-collectors in England as one of the stock tunes amongst the least old and interesting sung by the unlettered. Various sets of rather worthless words, as well as doggerel songs on historical or local persons, are sung to the air. 'With Collingwood we'll go' is one Sussex version, Collingwood being the naval hero of Nelson's time, and the contemporary of Rodney.

As to the birthplace or parentage of the above tunes: who can, who need decide? Certain it is, that two such musical nations as the English and Irish have not inhabited the same islands for centuries without a plentiful exchange of verse and melody. The migration of song and legend is as complex a subject as that of races. Who shall say what sailor, soldier, settler or gipsy first sang his song or told his story in a strange land? Who can tell what song or story he learned there? If foreign countries have exchanged naturally and freely in this manner, how much more must not the peoples of our British Islands have given and taken amongst each other, each race impressing its national touch upon the material borrowed? But is it not an honourable and happy thing to unite in admiring and preserving a stirring song, no matter where, or by whom, composed or transmuted?

As an instance of how complex the matter of 'nationality' is, let us assume that Dr. Flood's surmise is correct, and that Hussey, a gentleman-piper of the mid-18th century, did compose the original of the tune to which the titles 'To Rodney we will go' and 'Hussey's Maggot' have, amongst so many others, been attached. Now, the distinguished families of Hussey, both in England and Ireland, claim as their common ancestor Hubert Husey, a Norman nobleman settled in England at the time of the Conquest. From him descended Sir Hugh Hussey, who went from England to Ireland in the time of Henry II., acquired property and settled there, being the ancestor of the Irish Husseys. These appear to have usually married with families likewise of Anglo-Norman stock; but let us suppose that occasionally some Celtic blood may have been introduced: Of what nationality is Mr. Hussey's composition?

THE 'MESSIAH' (HANDEL).

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

SIR,—For many years I have thought how very helpful it would be towards the better understanding and fuller appreciation of the 'Messiah,' in all places where it is performed, if conductors of provincial choral societies would in public, either free or at a very small charge, a week or so before such performance, give an explanation of the oratorio, with illustrations sung and played.

This explanation should deal with prophecies of the coming of the Messiah, and the various points in Christ's career, noting the Advent portion—Nos. 5, 6, 7: 'Thus saith the Lord,' 'But who may abide,' 'And He shall purify the sons of Levi' (the tribe from which the priesthood were selected), 'The darkness covering the earth and gross darkness the people,' followed by 'O thou that tellest . . . arise, shine, for thy Light is come,' and 'For unto us a Child is born,' with the announcement to the amazed shepherds of the birth of the Saviour; the passion, death, resurrection, ascension, worship of angels; the preaching of the gospel resented by the heathen ('Why do the nations so furiously rage together?'; 'Let us break . . .'); 'The triumph of the Lord,' 'Hallelujah! for the Lord God omnipotent reigneth'; the mystery of the Resurrection, 'Behold, I show you a mystery'; 'The trumpet shall sound'; the sevenfold ascription in 'Worthy is the Lamb. Amen.'

A DICTIONARY OF WRITERS ON MUSIC.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

SIR,—Being engaged in collecting materials for an 'International bibliographical dictionary of writers on music,' I shall be obliged if British and foreign publishers and authors will supply me with lists of their works in volume form (published and about to be) relating to the history and criticism of music for insertion in my book. It will contain notices of about 5,000 authors, from the earliest times to the present, including editors and leading contributors to the musical journals, musical critics and lecturers, and literary men and women, travellers, and others, who have contributed valuable reminiscences of music and musicians. It will also be the first work of its kind in any language, the existing German, French, and English 'Dictionaries of music and musicians' consisting mainly of biographies of composers, singers and instrumentalists, and the writers on music having only a secondary and limited space. The leading idea will be to produce a book of reference and give only facts, and to exclude opinions as far as possible.—Yours faithfully,

ANDREW DE TERNANT.

Obituary.

We regret to have to report the following deaths:

The oldest professional musician in Ireland—Mrs. MCGUCKIN—passed away on December 5, in her ninety-fourth year. Born on May 17, 1817, Mrs. McGuckin was organist of Tandragee Church, co. Armagh, for over twenty years. She was the mother of Mr. Barton McGuckin, the distinguished tenor, to whom she gave his early training. The remains were interred at Mount Jerome on December 9.

Mr. JOSEPH GODDARD, at Hampstead, on December 9. Mr. Goddard was known chiefly as a musical essayist. His writings include 'Philosophy of music,' 'Musical development,' 'A study of Gounod's "Redemption,"' 'The deeper sources of the beauty and expression of music,' and 'The rise of music.' His 'Comparative view of the development of opera in Italy, Germany, France, and England' will shortly be published. He was also a composer. Mr. Goddard was born in 1833.

Mr. JOHN HUGH THOMSON, on December 17, at the age of seventy. Mr. Thomson was musical critic to The Queen, and had held the post for over thirty years. He will be remembered by his many friends in musical circles for his genial and kindly disposition.

Herr ANGELO NEUMANN, manager of the German Theatre at Prague. He was one of the foremost producers of Wagner's operas, some of which he introduced to Leipsic, Berlin, and London for the first time.

BEECHAM OPERA SEASON.

SALOME.

'Salome' has at last been heard in London. It is the third of the operas composed by Richard Strauss, the others being 'Guntram' (Op. 25), 'Feuersnot' (Op. 50), and 'Elektra' (Op. 58), which was produced at Dresden in 1909. 'Salome' (Op. 54) was produced on December 9, 1905, also at Dresden. It has had a dubious reception. The libretto, constructed from Oscar Wilde's drama, unfolds a repulsive story, and as it is based upon scriptural narrative and introduces St. John the Baptist, there were serious objections to its presentation on the English stage. Then the music itself throws down the gauntlet to criticism. Its realism is in questionable taste, and some of its experiments in harmonic combination are a cross to ordinary listeners whose ears have been tuned by what has hitherto passed as music. Yet with all its startling vagaries and morbidity it is impossible not to recognise the beauty of much of the music, its scintillating and fascinating orchestration, which provides in itself a constant stream of interest to any ear sensitive to colour. As in 'Elektra' there is only one scene, and the drama never pauses in its intensity during the hour and fifty minutes it lasts. In the original version Salome demands from Herod the head of St. John the Baptist, and having obtained it proceeds to fondle and embrace it: an episode to shudder at and not to see. This occurs after her dance of the Seven Veils, in which she uses all the salutary arts of seductive persuasion: her request is granted. Much as this dance has been talked about, it cannot be said to be entrancing as music. It owes its attractiveness more to its association with the motive of the dance than to its inherent beauty.

As the Censor would not allow the character of St. John to be presented on the stage, or the head of the Prophet to be used by Salome, alterations had to be made. A Prophet was substituted for St. John and his words are altered, and a simple empty tray is toyed with by Salome! The horror, therefore, is left to the imagination, but the situation thus created is almost perilously ludicrous, and it called for all the art of Madame Aino Ackté to avoid what was very near to a catastrophe. The action with the supposed head takes place in the presence of Herod and Herodias, and it so excites the detestation of the former that he orders the guard to kill Salome, and with this tragic end the curtain falls.

Whether the opera will take anything like a permanent place in the repertoire of opera houses is very doubtful. It is true that audiences generally are by no means reluctant to sup with horrors as a recreation, but surely this particular form of their presentation will soon pall? It is much to be hoped that Strauss, with his great mastery of the means of musical expression, will devote his genius to other and nobler uses than he has in this work.

Whatever the merits of the opera as drama or music, the British public have once again reason to be grateful to Mr. Thomas Beecham for enabling them to form an opinion of this much-debated work by actual experience. The performance we heard was conducted by Mr. Beecham, and it was in every respect an adequate one. The cast was as follows:

Salome .. .. .	Mme. Aino Ackté
Herodes .. .. .	Herr Franz Costa
Herodias .. .. .	Fräulein Petzl-Demmer
Ein Prophet .. .. .	Mr. Clarence Whitehill
Narraboth .. .. .	Mr. Maurice D'Oisy
Ein Page der Herodias .. .. .	Miss Stella Phibbs
3 Cappadocien .. .. .	{ Mr. Robert Radford
	{ Mr. Arthur Wynn
	{ Mr. Charles Knowles

	{ Mr. Lewys James
Conductor .. .. .	Mr. Thomas Beecham

OTHER OPERAS.

The production of 'Salome' practically absorbs the interest of the later stages of Mr. Beecham's season. Next in importance is the revival of an opera by an Englishman—Mr. Clutsam's 'A summer night.' On November 24, preceded by Humperdinck's 'Hänsel and Gretel,' this picturesque and cleverly-conceived work was performed by a highly efficient cast, among which the principals were Miss Beatrice la Palme, Miss Maggie Teyte, Mr. Walter Hyde, Mr. Lewis James and Mr. Harry Dearth. Madame Aino Ackté made her re-appearance on the boards of Covent Garden on November 25, when she played Senta in 'The Flying Dutchman,' with dramatic instinct and vocal power that foreshadowed her triumph as Salome. The last performance of 'Elektra' took place on November 26, with Fräulein Plaichinger in the title-rôle, and Fräulein Marie Goetze as Klytemnestra. Owing to sudden indispositions the parts of Elizabeth and Venus in 'Tannhäuser,' which was given on November 28, were entrusted to Miss Gleeson-White and Miss Toni Seiter, who carried them out with ability. 'Carmen,' performed on December 3, was a triumph for Frau Ottilie Metzger and Mr. John Coates. Debussy's 'Pelléas et Mélisande' was excellently performed, on December 19, with Miss Maggie Teyte and Mr. George Pétit in the principal parts, which they portrayed with outstanding ability.

At the Sunday concert, on November 27, a foretaste of 'Salome' was given in the shape of the 'Dance of the seven veils,' which was vividly played under Mr. Beecham's direction, and encoored. Two extracts from Dukas's 'Ariane et Barbe-Bleue' were sung by Madam Perelli. Mr. Frederic Austin's symphonic poem 'Isabella' and Strauss's 'Till Eulenspiegel' added further interest to the programme.

WELSH FOLK-SONG.

At a meeting of the London Schools Musical and Dramatic Association on November 15, at the College of Preceptors, Mr. Alfred Perceval Graves gave a lecture on 'Welsh Folk-song.' Miss Cordelia K. Rhys gave some charming songs in illustration, and also some 'penillion' singing. Sir Vincent Evans, chairman of the Welsh Folk-song Society, took the chair.

Welsh national music (said Mr. Graves) springs from harp-playing, from ballad-singing, and from folk-song. Giraldu Cambrensis witnesses that so far back as the 12th century part-singing was popular in Wales. By the 14th century the Welsh harp had in compass surpassed its Irish rival, and was adequate for the finer developments of mediæval music on the diatonic scale. Penillion singing, which probably originated on the battle-field, was specially cultivated in North Wales. Beautiful airs, brought thence or adapted from the folk-songs of South Wales, were adapted by German and other opera composers. The Methodist revival, however, in the 18th century, turned Welsh musicians entirely away from secular to sacred subjects, and folk-songs fell into danger of extinction till about the middle of the last century, when two poets, the station-master Cieriog and the clergyman Talhaern, wrote adequate verses to the beautiful airs that could still be recovered.

THE MUSICAL ASSOCIATION.

The lecturer at the meeting held at Messrs. Broadwood's rooms on December 6 was Mr. George Bernard Shaw, who gave the 'Recollections of a Quinquagenarian.' He was reminiscent of early Wagnerian days, praised Mr. James Glover as for many years the greatest master of orchestration in England, and criticised the tastes of the musical public. 'There is a certain type of concert audience,' he said, 'who watch a concert as they watch a football match. They insist on the rules of the game being observed. One of the popular conventions is that every song should end on a high note. The popular singer announces the conclusion of his song exactly as a locomotive announces its arrival at the station—on a high shriek.' He made an earnest plea that the profits of musical undertakings should go, not to charity, but to the endowment of music. At the end Mr. Glover and Dr. Lea Southgate spoke. Dr. W. H. Cummings was the chairman.

MUSIC TEACHERS' ASSOCIATION.

On November 19, the large hall of the Portman Rooms was filled by an interested audience, when Mr. Stewart Macpherson (the chairman of the committee of the above Association) delivered an address upon the historical development of the violin sonata as shown in sonatas by Tartini, Beethoven and Brahms. Mr. Macpherson said that the three works to be played during the afternoon were representative of three very notable periods in the history of instrumental music, and would reveal to those who had 'ears to hear' many things that were significant. First of all, they would exemplify to a large extent the spirit and idiom of the age in which they were respectively produced; secondly, the personal style of their individual authors; and, thirdly, several factors of interest in the development of the power of expression in music, depending largely upon the adequacy of 'working material.' Mr. Macpherson in his address sought to put the audience in the mood for appreciating the particular character of the work of each period, and the listeners were enabled to obtain a grip of the material of the music by having the principal themes played over before the performance of each movement. The artistic playing of Miss Winifred Christie (pianoforte) and Mr. Rowsby Woof (violin) contributed largely to the undoubted success of the meeting.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

The dramatic class, coached by Mr. Richard Temple, performed scenes from 'Hamlet,' and two sketches—'Petticoat perfidy' and 'Two shadows'—on December 2. Miss Olive Turner stood out from an excellent array of talent for her representation of Ophelia, and for her incidental music to the last-mentioned play. The operatic class showed on the following night that their work, carried out under the direction of Mr. Edgardo Lévi and Mr. Temple, is done to equally good purpose. In their revival of Schubert's 'Der Häusliche Krieg,' the indisposition of Miss L. Fairney at the last moment caused a difficulty, which was happily solved by Miss Edythe Goodman reading Miss Fairney's part, which was that of the principal lady. The other principals were Miss Margaret Ismay, Miss Olive Turner, Mr. E. Butcher, Mr. D. L. Fancourt, and Mr. F. W. Armstrong. In a selection from Donizetti's 'Lucia di Lammermoor,' Miss Anna Filipoff took the chief part, and was supported by Mr. Charles Shaw and Mr. Percy Heming.

At the terminal orchestral concert given on December 16, Miss Emma Lomax's orchestral 'Ruminations on a quaint subject' were the only novelty presented. Their quality was far above the average of the work of students, especially those of the gentler sex, as they revealed high intellectual and technical powers. The solo performers of the occasion were Miss E. Caspers, Miss Filipoff, Mr. C. W. Morris, and Mr. Fancourt (vocalists), Miss Lucy Ehrmann and Mr. Arthur Alexander (pianists), Miss Margaret Bowen Bernard (violinist), and Mr. Edwin Quaife (violinist). Sir Alexander Mackenzie conducted.

GUILDHALL SCHOOL OF MUSIC.

A performance of Weber's 'Oberon,' which had not been staged in London for many years, was given by pupils of the Guildhall School of Music in their theatre on November 28. The singing, especially that of Miss Madeline Harbert, was of a high order. The other principals were Miss Lettie Minns (Oberon), Miss Gladys Scott (Rezia), Miss Dorothy Dones (Puck), Mr. Steed (Hun), and Mr. Collins (Sherasmin). Mr. R. H. Walthew conducted, and Mr. B. Soutten was the stage-manager.

The orchestral class showed high and rapidly advancing powers at the concert given, on December 14, in the City of London School. Mr. Walter W. Hedgcock conducted an excellent performance of Mendelssohn's 'Scotch' symphony and of the accompaniment to Schumann's Pianoforte concerto, expressively played by Miss Dantine Sutherland.

The prize of 10 guineas offered for the best 'poster' suitable for use by the School, was won by Mr. William W. London.

ROYAL CHORAL SOCIETY.

Bach's Mass in B minor, which provides this Society with some of its best opportunities for dignified and massive singing, was performed, under the direction of Sir Frederick Bridge, on December 1, in the presence of a large audience. The occasion revealed further progress in the change of attitude to Bach's music that is manifesting itself in the minds of choralists and listeners all over the country. Many of the choruses were treated as things of beauty, and were impressed as such upon the audience, and as a result their wealth of meaning was realised and understood. The large scale upon which the performance was given brought out all the possibilities of impressive effect in the more broadly-designed sections. The soloists were Miss Perceval Allen, Miss Phyllis Lett, Mr. Lloyd Chandos and Mr. William Higley. Mr. H. L. Balfour was the organist.

LONDON CHORAL SOCIETY.

Both abstruseness and melancholy, so often associated with the 'neglected British work,' were banished from the London Choral Society's programme at Queen's Hall on December 8, and moreover the choir sang with an added vitality and expressive power. The audience were not slow to mark their approval of these features. The interest centred chiefly in Mr. Granville Bantock's 'Sea wanderers,' which had not been heard in London since its original production at the Leeds festival of 1907. 'Omar' has trained these London singers to a full knowledge of the composer's idiom, and they were able to interpret the picturesque imagination, and to execute the wayward vocal writing of Mr. Bantock's later work. Two small items sung on this occasion, that came practically as novelties, were Max Reger's 'A joyous Easter song' and Sir Edward Elgar's 'The Angelus.' The former is a bright and melodious piece; it narrowly escaped an encore. The latter is one of the best examples of Elgar's simple vein. Its unaffected charm was fully realised in the performance, except for the adoption of an over-slow tempo. The final work on the programme was Mr. Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha's Wedding-feast.' Accompaniments were played by the London Symphony Orchestra, and Mr. Arthur Fagge conducted.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

At the concert given on November 30 the interest centred on the second performance by this Society of Elgar's new Violin concerto and the appearance of Mlynarski as conductor of all the other part of the concert. Herr Kreisler, as before, played the Concerto with consummate skill, and the composer conducted. Again there was an immense audience, and the work was received with enthusiasm. The Symphony was No. 4 in F minor by Tchaikovsky, and it received an interesting if not powerfully impressive performance. Mr. Edmund Burke sang Coleridge-Taylor's 'Sons of the sea' and Wagner's 'Les deux grenadiers' with great effect.

On December 7, the concert was conducted by Mr. Thomas Beecham, and the programme was apparently influenced by his known predilection. It included Mozart's Symphony in C (No. 34), the symphonic poem 'Paris' (Delius), and 'The Flying Dutchman' Vorspiel (Wagner). Mr. Beecham's alert style, rhythmic decision and power to interpret were well tested in the Delius poem, which to us, at least, improves on second hearing, but it must be confessed that there are some passages hard to understand. Another item was the 'Sinfonie Montagnarde' by Vincent d'Indy, for orchestra and pianoforte—a composition which treats the pianoforte more as a part of the orchestra than as a solo instrument. The pianoforte part was admirably played by Miss Katherine Ruth Heyman. The work itself has many points of interest. The treatment of the simple tune with which the first movement opens is ingenious and beautiful. The second movement, Assez modéré, has much charm, but the Finale is less interesting, notwithstanding some fine climaxes. Mr. W. H. Bell conducted his Phantasy-prelude 'The Shepherd,' which to our mind is one of the best of his orchestral compositions. He has poetical sense and the power to reflect it in his music.

LONDON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

A new work by Mr. Julius Harrison, 'Night on the mountains,' was performed at the concert given under Dr. Richter's direction on December 5. The composer of the prize-cantata 'Cleopatra' retains the fertile imagination that he poured into his early work, and is learning to control it more judiciously, with the result that in his latest work he expresses himself with greater certainty and effect. The underlying thought of the composition, suggested by a portion of Ossian's poem 'Carriathura,' is expressed in the line 'Autumn is dark on the mountains.' It is illustrated by Mr. Harrison in his music with appropriate colouring, mastery of technical means, and telling thematic description. Schumann's Pianoforte concerto is often heard in London, but on this occasion the presence of the brilliant executant, Mr. Frederick Dawson, as the soloist, lent extra interest to the performance. Symphonies by Schumann (B flat) and Beethoven (No. 2), with the former composer's 'Genoveva' overture, made the rest of the programme.

On December 17 an extra concert was given. The familiar scheme of a Wagner programme was varied by the presentation of the whole of the first act of 'Tristan and Isolde,' with English words. Miss Gleeson-White, Miss Perceval Allen, Mr. Morgan Kingston and Mr. Charles Knowles sang the solo parts with intense expression; and the orchestra, under Dr. Richter's direction, extracted all the possible meaning from the score. It was unfortunate that the version of the text printed in the programme book was different from that used by the singers.

QUEEN'S HALL SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The chief attraction of the concert given on December 3 was M. Mischa Elman's interpretation of the Tchaikovsky Violin concerto. It was technically faultless, perfect in phrasing and well-balanced expression. The element of novelty was introduced into the programme by Mr. Wood's arrangement, in the form of a Suite for strings, of music taken from Bach's organ concertos. The transcription had been carried out with so masterful a hand that no inappropriateness could be observed, and an interesting work has been added to orchestral répertoires. The symphony was the third by Brahms, which was played gracefully and in a manner to bring out all the detailed delicacy of the composer's workmanship. The concert opened with Beethoven's 'Prometheus' overture.

London Concerts.

INCORPORATED SOCIETY OF MUSICIANS.

Four works by English composers belonging to the London division were played at the concert given at Morley Hall on December 10. Mr. H. A. Keyser's Quartet was not over-ambitious except in length, and displayed considerable technical power and significant thematic invention. The same qualities also distinguished a Pianoforte trio by Mr. Gordon Burgess and a Pianoforte sonata by Dr. Cecil Hazlehurst, except for their greater conciseness. In conjunction with Mr. Lewis Carey's 'Extase,' these works provided a continuous example of well-directed purpose, imagination and scholarship.

THE PATRON'S FUND CONCERT.

The annual chamber music concert supported by the fund and organized by the Royal College of Music, was given at the Bechstein Hall on December 12. The chief items were sonatas by Felix White (pianoforte and violoncello) and Eric Gritton (pianoforte and violin), and a pianoforte fantasia by Felix Swinstead; all these pieces showed talent. That by Mr. Swinstead especially exhibited much fluency and brilliancy. Two songs by Frank St. Leger were fairly attractive, but we were not much struck with the songs by Eric Coates. Mr. Gordon Burgess contributed two well-written pianoforte solos; and Miss Violet Brown, a young girl who won a first-prize at the recent Preston festival, sang very delightfully, but she will have to be conserved if she is to develop.

THE NEW SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

A Tchaikovsky programme was chosen for the second concert of the series, given by this Orchestra under Mr. Landon Ronald's direction, which took place on December 14. M. Petschnikoff gave an impulsive reading of the Violin concerto, and a similar but emotionally more interesting interpretation of the 'Pathetic' Symphony followed. The Orchestra were heard at their best in the Theme and Variations from the Suite in G.

AMATEUR ORCHESTRAS.

The Stock Exchange Orchestral and Choral Society gave a concert before a large audience at Queen's Hall on December 9. The orchestral works, directed by Mr. Allen Gill, included Beethoven's Violin concerto, with M. Szigeti as soloist. Mr. Norman O'Neill conducted his own four dances from 'The blue bird.' Some excellent part-singing was provided by the Male-voice Choir, under the direction of Mr. Munro Davison.

The Strolling Players' Amateur Orchestral Society gave a smoking concert at Queen's Hall on December 15, with an interesting programme that included such unfamiliar numbers as Litolff's overture 'Robespierre' and Chaminade's 'Callirhoe' suite. The soloists were Miss Adeline Leon (violinist), Miss Violet Elliott (contralto), and Mr. Lawrence Legge (tenor).

VOCAL RECITALS.

Miss Marjorie Tempest, who gave a recital at Bechstein Hall on November 22, showed considerable vocal and interpretative gifts.

Miss Julia Hostater made full use of her exceptional powers as a lieder-singer in giving her recital at Bechstein Hall on November 22, when she devoted her attention to modern German song. At a second recital, on November 29, she showed equal facility in interpreting the older schools, and some examples of modern French music.

Though not a recital, the appearance of Miss Fiffine de la Côte at the Palace Theatre on November 24 deserves mention here. This young singer displayed a remarkable gift of fluent vocalisation, a voice of unusual upward range, and great expressive power.

Madame Margarethe Roche showed ability as an interpreter of German song at Bechstein Hall on November 24. At the same hall, in the evening, a vocal recital was given by the friends of Mr. R. J. Pitcher.

Miss Julia Culp's outstanding ability in the same sphere was revealed at Bechstein Hall on November 26. Her appearances in this country are less frequent than one could wish.

Mr. Robert Burnett gave an excellent recital of Scottish song at Æolian Hall on November 28. He showed a strong power of characterization, and many other qualities that added to the pleasure he gave. Miss Katherine Jones's singing at Æolian Hall on November 29 revealed an improvement in the direction of expression.

Miss Helen Blain's recital at Queen's Hall on December 1 was distinguished by an interesting programme, and the assistance of the Queen's Hall Orchestra under Mr. Wood. Brahms's Alto Rhapsody was the chief work. Miss Blain gave expressive interpretations of the three beautiful songs by Sir Edward Elgar introduced at the Jaeger Memorial Concert in January last, namely, 'Oh soft was the song,' 'Was it some golden star?' and 'Twilight'; the last-named proved so attractive that it had to be repeated.

Mr. Harold Colonna, who gave a recital at Bechstein Hall on December 1, displayed a powerful voice and an emotional style.

Miss Maggie Teyte, having shown at her previous recital her ability to interpret modern French vocal music, turned her attention on December 3, at Æolian Hall, to old French music, of which she brought forward a number of unfamiliar examples. Her attractive readings were supported by the playing of the Beecham Orchestra.

Miss Leila S. Hoelterhoff, who gave a recital at Bechstein Hall on December 5, showed great versatility in the number of different schools she was able to draw upon and the success she achieved in all her interpretations. On the same day M. Juan de la Cruz made his postponed first appearance in England, and displayed a powerful bass voice.

Mr. Roland Jackson's pleasant tenor voice was put to good use at Æolian Hall, on December 6, in a programme that gave prominence to Russian songs. Mr. Thorold Waters, assisted by Miss Violet Runciman, brought forward a modern programme at Steinway Hall on December 7.

Madame Jeanne Raunay, after neglecting us for some years, came to London to give a recital on December 6 at Bechstein Hall, and gained renewed admiration for her powers. These were expressed in a group of excerpts from 'Le Nozze di Figaro,' cantatas by Schlitz, and, best of all, in modern French songs.

Recitals were given by Mr. Carlton Brough, on December 8, at Bechstein Hall; by the Misses Houghton and Huxley, pupils of Madame Albani, at Bechstein Hall; by the Misses Hillyard-Swinstead, each of whom accompanied the other, at Æolian Hall, on December 9; by the Misses Milman, with a programme of old French and English folk-songs, at Steinway Hall on December 10; by Miss Nellie Woodward, at Bechstein Hall, on December 12; and by Miss Margaret Wild, previously known as a pianist, at Æolian Hall, on December 13.

PIANOFORTE RECITALS.

Although Mr. Ernest Schelling's recital at Bechstein Hall on November 22, pointed to greater technical than expressive powers, he made a strong claim, on November 29, to be considered one of the foremost living interpreters of Chopin. On the latter occasion he played a number of pieces chosen from the programme of his recent recital at Lemberg, by which he gained the favour of musical Poland.

Señor Vianna da Motta was heard at Bechstein Hall on November 22, in a programme largely devoted to Liszt. Mr. Cecil Baumer, one of the clever young pianists trained in the Mathilde Verne School, gave a well-attended and completely successful recital at Queen's Hall on November 23, with the assistance of Mr. Wood and his orchestra. M. Cernikoff played at Æolian Hall on November 26, and introduced some new pieces, including Debussy's 'La plus que lente valse.' Mr. Herbert Fryer continued his series of historical recitals at Æolian Hall on November 29 and December 7. His two programmes represented the Romantic and Modern schools, and served to illustrate his versatility. Mr. Arthur Newstead, one of the more refined of our young English pianists, gave an example of legitimate methods at Bechstein Hall on November 30. At Steinway Hall, on December 6, Mr. Claud Biggs gave some excellent Bach playing, and on December 13 he showed his proficiency in other schools.

Mr. Howard-Jones introduced a curious production of M. Maurice Ravel's imagination at Bechstein Hall on December 8. It was entitled 'Le Gibet,' and illustrated, with appropriately nauseous harmonies, the unlovely details of a subject compared to which 'Salome' is idyllic. Mr. Archy Rosenthal's recital on December 8, Miss Ada Wright's on December 12, and Miss M. K. Snowden's on December 13, all at Æolian Hall, were agreeable, but presented no exceptional features.

The shadow of a coming event fell on the Queen's Hall, on December 14, when M. Sapelnikoff gave a concert entirely devoted to Liszt's compositions. He played the first and second Pianoforte concertos, the 'Wanderer' fantasia, and a Hungarian fantasia with mastery and brilliance. The Queen's Hall Orchestra assisted, under Dr. Rumschisky's guidance.

OTHER RECITALS.

Concerning Mischa Elman's playing at Queen's Hall, on November 26, it is sufficient to say that it revealed no diminution of his extraordinary powers. His programme included Tartini's 'Trillo del Diavolo' sonata, Lalo's Symphonie Espagnole, an Aria by Max Reger, and other small works, and was carried out with pianoforte accompaniment played by Mr. Percy B. Kahn.

Herr Feri Weltmann and Fräulein Rozzi Weltmann, two youthful violinists, were heard at Steinway Hall on November 30, and showed considerable promise.

Miss Helen Mott and M. Béla von Csuka showed great proficiency as violoncellists, in giving their recitals at Æolian Hall on November 22 and Bechstein Hall on November 25 respectively.

Mr. Philip Cathie gave a pleasant recital, with an interesting programme, at Steinway Hall on December 6. In conjunction with Mr. Harold Brooke, at the pianoforte, he gave attractive readings of Veracini's Sonata in E minor and Strauss's Sonata (Op. 18). Miss Elaine Birch showed an agreeable voice and expressive style in Bach arias and modern songs, which included Mr. Frederic Austin's 'Home thoughts from abroad.'

Herren Willibald Richter (pianist) and Hans Neumann (violinist) gave a second sonata recital at Steinway Hall, on November 24, with an interesting programme chosen from Mozart, Schubert, Franck and Sinding.

Signor Mario Lorenzi, the clever young harpist, was heard in Oberthur's Concertino at Messrs. Broadwood's rooms, on December 9.

Beethoven's Pianoforte trio, Op. 70, No. 2, was played, and new vocal trios by Mr. W. A. Pickard-Cambridge were sung by the Misses Eyre, daughters of Mr. J. A. Eyre, at Æolian Hall, on December 10.

Messrs. Kubelik and Backhaus gave a combined display of their exquisite executive neatness and well-moderated sentimentality at Queen's Hall, on December 10.

Mr. Alfred Gallrein, who is retiring from the profession, gave a recital at Steinway Hall on December 15, and played two of his own violoncello pieces.

M. Petschnikoff gave a violin recital at Bechstein Hall on December 16, introducing a Suite, new to England, by Dr. Christian Sinding, written for two violins and pianoforte; Madame Petschnikoff was the second violinist.

CHAMBER MUSIC.

The clever Walenn Quartet gave an example of their refined methods on November 22 at Æolian Hall, in playing Mozart's 'Ideal' Quartet in B flat and Hugo Wolf's 'Italian serenade,' and showed ability of a different character in Dohnányi's Quartet in D flat (Op. 15). Fräulein Gabriele Wietrowetz, a pupil of Joachim, appeared at the seventh concert of the Classical Concert Society at Bechstein Hall on November 22, and led with great ability a quartet party composed, for the rest, of familiar English players. The Wessely Quartet were heard on the following evening at Bechstein Hall, in a programme that included Mr. James Friskin's Pianoforte quintet in C minor, and a movement from a quartet by Tancéw.

The Albion Trio, whose members are now Miss Louise Aumonier (pianist), Miss Dorothea Walenn (violinist), and Miss Phyllis Hasluck (violoncellist), introduced a new Fantasia Trio in C, by Mr. Martin Shaw, in the programme of their concert at Æolian Hall on November 24.

The St. Petersburg Quartet, whose playing may be equalled but is rarely excelled, made two further appearances at Bechstein Hall on November 28 and December 2. Their programmes were devoted principally to Russian music, the least familiar examples being quartets by Wiuxler (Op. 14) and Borodin (No. 2), both played at the second recitals. At the first the string players were joined by Mr. A. M. Henderson, in a performance of Schumann's Pianoforte quintet.

The Motto Quartet, consisting of Miss Marie Motto, Mr. T. F. Morris, Mr. Frank Bridge, and Mr. R. Purcell-Jones, gave a concert at Bechstein Hall on November 28, and introduced three pleasant 'Novelletten' by Mr. Bridge. They were again heard on December 13 in a programme that included Mr. Bridge's quartet in E minor.

The Société des Concerts Français gave one of their unique concerts on November 29, with the assistance of the Société Moderne d'Instruments à Vent, who played to perfection old and modern French works written for various combinations of flute, oboe, clarinet, bassoon, and horn. Songs were contributed by Madame L. Durand-Texte.

A new Quartet by Sir Charles Stanford, distinguished by his usual straightforward melodic invention, scholarly treatment and steady resistance to modern influences, was performed by the Wessely Quartet at a Broadwood concert given in Æolian Hall on December 1.

The Ackroyd Quartet played for the Classical Concert Society on December 7, at Bechstein Hall, and brought forward a Quartet in D minor by Max Reger. Messrs. Hans Neumann (violinist), Mr. Charles A. Crabbe (violinist) and Mr. Neville Swainson (pianist) provided chamber music at the Crystal Palace on December 10, with a programme that included Schumann's D minor Trio.

Beethoven's second Pianoforte trio was duly played by the London Trio at their second concert at Æolian Hall on December 12. They were afterwards joined by Mr. Ernest Tomlinson in Brahms's Pianoforte quartet in G minor. The playing was marked throughout by characteristic vigour, skill and earnestness. Solos were given by Mr. Whitehouse (violinist) and Miss Agnes Christa (vocalist).

A highly interesting programme of modern chamber music was given by Mr. Holbrooke at Steinway Hall on December 19. It comprised Max Reger's Trio in E minor, César Franck's Trio in E, and Mr. Holbrooke's own highly-imaginative and vigorous 'Diabolique' quintet. The executants were the New Quartet and the concert-giver.

The 'Ancient dances and music' which Miss Nellie Chaplin reproduces with such skill, knowledge and artistic effect were again exhibited in all their diversity of character and design at Queen's (small) Hall on November 26, in aid of the building fund of the Heritage School of Arts and Crafts for crippled boys, at Chailey.

Mr. Smallwood Metcalfe's Choir gave a concert of madrigals and part-songs at Queen's Hall on November 29, and sang with their usual enthusiasm and care. The programme was made additionally attractive by solos from Miss Mignon Nevada and M. Benno Moiseiwitsch.

A concert of Mr. Ernest Austin's compositions, given at 44, Finchley Road, on December 1, called further attention to his inexhaustible vein of fancy and his cleverness in designing and constructing his works, whether great or small. The chief number was a Pianoforte trio in D major, which was played by Madame Lily Henkel, Mr. John Saunders and Mr. Ivor James. Songs were sung by Miss Grainger-Kerr, violin and pianoforte solos were played by Miss Roma Austen and Miss Marjorie Adam.

Mr. Plunket Greene gave his second lecture on Interpretation in Song at Æolian Hall on December 2, before a large audience fully alive to the value of his remarks and his attractive way of presenting his ideas.

All who were concerned in the performance of the complete 'Hiawatha' trilogy by the Alexandra Palace Choral and Orchestral Society on December 10, had their hearts in the work, and helped to give an admirable interpretation. The size of the choir was no hindrance to its expressive efforts, and the smaller effects were obtained as fluently as the larger. Mr. Allen Gill conducted. The soloists were Miss Ada Forrest, Mr. Gwynne Davies and Mr. Ivor Foster.

On December 10 the Novello Choir, conducted by Dr. McNaught, gave a concert at Caxton Hall. Haydn's 'Spring' was the chief feature of the programme, the remainder of which was miscellaneous. Mrs. Calverley Bewicke recited, and violin solos were given by Mr. Philip Cathie. The vocal soloists were Miss Elaine Birch, Mr. Roland Jackson, and Mr. George Baker.

The principal feature of the orchestral concert given by the Royal College of Music on December 13 was an excellent performance of Brahms's Violin concerto by Miss Dorothy Devin. The chief purely orchestral number was Dvořák's 'Symphonic variations.' Sir Charles Stanford conducted.

Mr. Paul Ludwig, assisted by Miss Grainger-Kerr, Mr. Louis Zimmermann, and Mr. Herbert Fryer, gave his annual concert at Messrs. Broadwood's on December 16.

The Oriana Madrigal Society varied their usual scheme, on December 19, by introducing Bach's cantata 'Jesu, we will now praise Thee,' into the programme. Mr. Charles Kennedy Scott conducted.

Suburban Concerts.

An 'Evening with Schumann,' in the form of a concert-lecture, by Mr. Walter J. Walls, was held in the Lecture Hall, Grosvenor Road, Ilford, on November 21. In illustration of the lecturer's remarks on Schumann's life and works the Pianoforte quintet was performed, and some part-songs were finely interpreted by the church choir. Songs were given by Miss Marsden Owen and Mr. Leonard Hubbard.

On November 26, the People's Palace Musical Society, so ably conducted by Mr. Frank Idle, performed Sullivan's 'The Golden Legend' before a good audience. The choir, one of the most proficient in the East-End, sang the choruses creditably in respect of both expression and choral technique. The soloists were Miss Euneta Truscott, Madame Cecile Vicars, Mr. Gwilym Richards, and Mr. Jackson Potter and Mr. F. R. Cutler. An orchestra gave efficient and well-controlled support.

The Crystal Palace Orchestral Society and Choir, conducted by Mr. Walter W. Hedgecock, gave a Bohemian concert on November 26, at which Stanford's 'The Battle of the Baltic' and Mr. James R. Dear's 'Songs of the open air' were the chief works performed. The efforts of all concerned were on the usual high level of this Society's doings. The soloists were Miss Ivy Angove (violin), Mr. Josip Stano (violinello) and Mr. Robert Carr (vocalist).

The concert version of Gounod's 'Faust' was adopted by the Lewisham Choral Society for their concert at Blackheath on December 1. The melodious choruses were excellently sung, with a regard for their rhythmic and tuneful qualities that appealed to the audience. Mr. Frank Idle conducted, and the soloists were Miss Mabel Manson, Miss Florence Taylor, Mr. William Green, Mr. Arthur Rose and Mr. William Waite.

On December 6, the Ealing Philharmonic Society gave an enjoyable performance of 'King Olaf,' under the safe guidance of their energetic conductor, Mr. Victor Williams, who is much to be congratulated on bringing his enthusiastic amateurs through a difficult task with such admirable results. The soloists, Miss Emily Shepherd, Mr. Webster Millar, and Dr. Dawson Freer were all that could be desired.

The Richmond Philharmonic Society, conducted by Dr. C. E. Jolly, gave a successful concert at the Castle Assembly Rooms, on December 6, before a large audience. The chief choral work performed was Hoffmann's 'Cinderella,' in which the solo parts were taken by Madame Amy Shergold, Miss Florence Taylor and Mr. Graham Smart. The orchestra played Haydn's 'Military' Symphony and Weber's 'Jubel' overture.

A highly successful performance of 'Elijah' was given on Tuesday evening, December 6, by the Chiswick and Gunnersbury Philharmonic Society, at the Chiswick Town Hall, which was completely filled with an audience that gave proof of its appreciation. The choir numbered 120 and sang with excellent tone and attack. The orchestra of sixty, which was complete in every detail, played unobtrusively. The principal soloists were Miss Alice Hare, Miss Aimée Parkerson, Mr. Samuel Masters and Mr. Robin Overleigh. Mr. Harry Dixon was the organist. The performance reflects great credit on the conductor, Mr. David M. Davis.

The Bermondsey Settlement Choral and Orchestral Union gave a well-prepared and enjoyable performance of Handel's 'Samson,' at the Great Central Hall on December 7. Dr. Borland conducted ably, and obtained some excellent choral results. The soloists were Miss Jennie Taggart, Madame Cecile Vicars, Madame Lilian Piggott, Mr. Joseph Farrington, Mr. Joseph Cheetham and Mr. David Evans. An orchestra, assisted by Mr. E. Stanley Roper at the organ, played the accompaniments.

The Acton Choral and Orchestral Society opened its season on December 7, with a performance of 'St. Paul,' at the Central Hall, under the direction of Mr. F. E. Williams. The singing of the chorists revealed excellent training and a high standard of proficiency. A small orchestra was led by Miss Phyllis Parker. The soloists were Miss Ruby Shepherd, Miss Spencer, Mr. Tracy and Mr. E. Danvers.

The Twickenham Philharmonic Society exceeded all its previous efforts, on December 8, with a performance of Sullivan's 'Golden Legend,' under the direction of Mr. Arthur Cowen. The expression and rich tone of the choral singing, and the careful attention to detail, testified to the excellence of the training. The soloists were Miss Marion Perrott, Miss Mildred Avis, Mr. Alexander Webster, and Mr. Stewart Gardiner.

A large audience attended at the Fulham Town Hall, on December 8, when the Fulham and District Choral Society performed Gounod's 'Redemption.' The choir of 150 voices was well balanced, and was accompanied by a full orchestra of fifty performers, led by Mr. Edgar Wilby. Excellent results were obtained by the conductor, Mr. George Wilby. The solo parts were sustained by the Misses Margaret Layton, Marie Stiven, M. A. Legar, and Messrs. Gwilym Richards and George Uttley.

The Teddington Philharmonic Society gave the first concert of their season on December 13, when the programme consisted entirely of Elgar's works (vocal and instrumental), the principal item being 'The banner of St. George,' of which an admirable performance was secured, Miss Edith Kirkwood taking the solo portions. Three 'Songs from the Bavarian Highlands,' and the unaccompanied part-song 'My love dwelt in a northern land,' were given with artistic finish. Miss Kirkwood and Mr. William Burt contributed songs, and Mr. S. W. Spurr and Miss Mary Noverre played violoncello and violin solos respectively. The orchestra, in addition to accompanying the choral works, performed the 'Serenade' (for strings), 'Chanson de Nuit' and 'Pomp and Circumstance' (No. 1). Mr. A. M. Fox was at the organ, and Mr. William Ratcliffe conducted.

The 200th smoking concert of the South London Musical Club was given on Tuesday, December 13, at the Surrey Masonic Hall, Camberwell New Road. Grieg's 'Landerkenning' and Gadsby's 'Columbus' formed the first part of the programme. Mr. Wilfrid Virgo sang the tenor solo music, and the attractive choruses were splendidly given by the choir of fifty. In the second part, Gernsheim's 'Salamis' and Mendelssohn's 'To the sons of art' and 'Festgesang' were performed. Mr. H. L. Balfour conducted. A contingent from the London Symphony Orchestra accompanied.

The Woodside Park Musical Society gave, at Woodside Hall on December 13, a highly creditable performance of Sterndale Bennett's 'May Queen,' which testified to the zeal and ability of their conductor, Mr. George Hooper. The soloists were Miss Ida Kahn, Miss Maud Masters, Mr. F. J. Webster and Mr. Allen Engles.

The Winchmore Hill Choral Society opened its third season with a performance of Stanford's 'The Revenge' and Elgar's 'The Banner of St. George,' in the Institute, on December 14. The poems were each recited by Miss Lilian Exton—a course which was much appreciated by the audience. An efficient orchestra accompanied. Miss Madge Burdge and Mr. George Foxon were the soloists. The concert closed with Mackenzie's beautiful part-song, 'The singers.' Mr. Henry S. Plummer conducted.

The Clapham Choral and Orchestral Society gave a performance of Gluck's 'Orpheus' on December 14, under Mr. R. Morpew Nixon's direction. The principal solo parts were taken by Miss Lilian Berger and Miss Flora Mann.

On December 14, a joint concert was given in the Town Hall, Epping, by the Choral and Orchestral Societies. Handel's 'Acis and Galatea' occupied the first part of the programme. The solo parts were taken by Madame E. Windsor Locke, Mr. Herbert Clinch and Mr. Robert Greir. The choruses were finely sung. The second part of the programme was miscellaneous. The choir gave Barby's 'Silent night,' and the orchestra played the first movement of Haydn's sixth Symphony. Mr. Donald Penrose conducted.

Handel's 'Messiah' was performed on December 14, at the Forest Hill Baths, under the direction of Mr. William Naylor. For a young society the interpretation given was excellent. The soloists were Miss Winifred Burke, Miss Mary Wynne Hulm, Mr. Robert Curtis and Mr. Frederick Milton.

The Great Western Railway Musical Society (choir and orchestra of eighty performers) opened their season on December 15 with a creditable performance of Edward German's 'Merrie England' and the 'Nell Gwyn' suite of dances, in the Half-yearly Meeting Room, Paddington Station, under the able direction of Mr. Henry A. Hughes. The principal soloists were Miss Florence Holderness, Miss Lily Gover, Miss Mildred Evans, Mr. Joseph Boddy and Mr. Allen Engles.

A Christmas dinner fund concert was given by the Sunday School Union Choral Society, from Stepney Meeting House, on December 15, at Devons Road Baptist Church, Bow, conducted by Mr. George Merritt.

The Edmonton All Saints' Choral Society gave on December 15 a highly creditable performance, with orchestra, of the 'Faust' concert selection. The soloists, Miss Lilian Turnbull (Margarita), Miss Ethel Harvey (Siebel), Mr. Ashton Thomas (Faust), and Mr. Harry Long (Mephistopheles) sang excellently. Mr. B. J. Hales conducted.

The South London Institute of Music opened its forty-third season on December 16, with an excellent performance of the complete 'Hiawatha' under Mr. L. C. Venables's direction. Miss Maud Willby, Mr. Alfred Heather and Mr. Henry Bailey were the principals. Mr. Sydney Venables was at the organ.

MUSIC IN VIENNA.

(FROM OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.)

December 15, 1910.

It seems that there is to be no peace at the Opera. Scarcely had the trouble in the directorship settled down, when the men in the chorus went on strike, and without any warning caused an unprecedented situation at a performance of 'Lohengrin.' They all went on in costume as usual, but sang sotto voce, and could for the most part not be heard at all. The audience answered with hissing and whistling, and other marked signs of disapproval. Naturally all the delinquents were dismissed, and were only re-admitted as a special act of grace, there being, of course, no talk of acceding to their demands after such a procedure. The new director, Herr Gregor, has already come to Vienna to get into touch with the artists. The ex-director, Herr Weingartner, is earning fresh triumphs as conductor of the Philharmonic Concerts, at the last of which a new symphony by himself, interesting if somewhat drawn out, was performed.

The second Gesellschaftskonzert was especially attractive, the programme containing some of the less-known cantatas by Bach, in which Herr Messchaert sang brilliantly. Beethoven's 'Missa solennis' was performed under Schalk's direction at an extra concert of the Königl. Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde, for which the house was sold out. Recent visitors of importance have been the fine violoncellist Pablo Casals, Emil Sauer and Godowsky. The French composer, Debussy, directed a concert of his own works, and received a respectful hearing. A performance of Nicodé's 'Gloria,' by the Philharmonic Choir, under Herr Schreker, was greeted with almost universal laughter. The cleverest and most experienced musicians present were not certain whether they had to deal with a seriously-intended work or an intentional caricature of the ultra-modern non-plus-ultra music. It is a pity that such experiments not only find their way into the concert-hall, but even win a few admirers.

RICHARD VON PERGER.

The Evanston (Illinois) Musical Club gave, at the first concert of the season on November 17, 'Endymion's Dream,' by Coleridge-Taylor, and 'The wedding of Shon Maclean,' by Hubert Bath. The soloists, Mrs. Sybil Sammis-McDermid and H. Evan Williams, gave a very satisfactory account of themselves, and the choir made the most of their opportunities. Professor Peter Christian Lutkin conducted.

Music in the Provinces.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENTS.)

BATH.

On November 24 and 25 there was a musical festival in the Abbey, and some important works were performed. A chorus of 145 voices, all Bathonians, and an orchestra of forty-five, chiefly professional players, had been rehearsing under Mr. A. E. New, the Abbey organist. On the afternoon of the first day, 'Elijah' and Gounod's 'Redemption' were effectively performed; the latter attracted a very large congregation. The works given on the second day were Sir Hubert Parry's 'Judith,' under the direction of the composer, and Mendelssohn's 'Hymn of Praise.' The chief soloists at the festival were Madame Emily Squire, Miss Mildred Jones, Mr. Joseph Read, and Mr. Thorpe Bates. The general conductor of the festival was Mr. A. E. New.

BELFAST.

To those who have an intelligent concern in the progress of music in such large centres of population as Belfast, the doings of organizations for practice and performance must necessarily have greater interest than a mere record of the visits of touring parties, no matter how celebrated the names of the artists included in them.

We are here rather suffering under a spell of such parties, no doubt often very fine in their way and captivating to those who think they get better 'value for their money,' and whose tastes are perhaps not sufficiently educated to appreciate the difference between a fine choral and orchestral work and a concert made up largely of 'drawing-room' solos and not very interesting songs. It is to be hoped the fashion will pass as many like ones have done before, and for very weariness the public taste will take a healthier tone.

Mr. Phillips's touring party, which visited us on November 25, brought Herr Kreisler, Miss May Currie, and Mr. Haddon Squire. It would be impertinent to criticise, almost to praise, so great an artist as Herr Kreisler, but there was nothing in the programme calling for comment.

On December 2, the Philharmonic Society (now practically our only musical society on a large scale) performed Saint-Saëns's 'Samson and Delilah,' which was so popular when performed here last year for the first time on a concert platform in Ireland. It was again greatly appreciated, and as it is a work calculated to tax the resources of a purely provincial choir and orchestra, the Society is to be congratulated on another very successful rendering of it. The soloists were Miss Bessie Weir, Mr. Henry Brearley and Mr. Thorpe Bates, the minor solo parts being taken by amateur members of the Society. With the exception of two members, the orchestra was drawn entirely from local sources, and Dr. Koeller deserves infinite credit for his training of them as well as of his fine choir (about 330), of whom, although many are experienced singers, a large percentage are new additions, eager to improve themselves by study under so skilful a teacher.

The usual Christmas performances of Handel's 'Messiah,' on December 16 and 17, by the same Society, were most popular and successful. The soloists were Miss G. Rennyson, Miss Edith Clegg, Mr. Gwilym Wigley (who took the place of Mr. Webster Millar, unfortunately unable by reason of illness to fulfil his engagement), and Mr. Robert Radford. All were most efficient, especially Miss Rennyson and Mr. Radford, whose parts were performed in a manner rarely equalled and never excelled here. They both were most complimentary to the choir and orchestra.

BIRMINGHAM.

The second Harrison concert of the current series was given in the Town Hall on November 21, and took the shape of a pianoforte recital by M. de Pachmann, who was in excellent form. The twenty-second annual Scottish Concert was given in the Town Hall on November 23, under the auspices of the Birmingham and Midland Scottish Society. Hitherto the celebrated Glasgow Select Choir of twenty-four voices has supplied the whole programme at these functions, but owing to being on a concert tour in Canada their services were not available, and in their place the management had secured a number of Scottish solo vocalists, including Miss Jenny Taggart, Miss Nina Hornsborough, Mr. Alexander Webster, and Mr. Robert Burnett, assisted by the Scottish violinist, Mr. Mackenzie Murdoch, the pipers and dancers of the 2nd Battalion of H.M. Scots Guards, headed by Pipe-Major A. Ross, and Mr. A. J. Cotton, who gave organ solos.

The Birmingham Festival Choral Society's second concert of the season, which took place at the Town Hall on November 24, was entirely made up of Handelian music, which always appeals strongly to local audiences. The first part of the programme comprised a copious selection from 'Israel in Egypt,' including some of the finest double choruses in the oratorio, which the choristers sang quite 'con amore,' realising a broad and massive tone, perfect attack and rhythmical phrasing. One need only single out the magnificent exposition of the choruses 'He led them through the deep,' 'He gave them hailstones for rain,' 'I will sing unto the Lord,' and 'Sing ye to the Lord.' A deep impression was created by Mr. Watkin Mills and Mr. Allister Proctor, with their sonorous and virile interpretation of the duet 'The Lord is a Man of War,' the voices admirably blending. The choral portions in the second part of the programme consisted of 'Envy, eldest born of Hell,' from 'Saul,' and the coronation anthem, 'Zadok the Priest,' in which the full sonority and the full power of the choir vividly asserted themselves. Madame Agnes Nicholls was the soprano and Mr. Webster Millar the tenor, both artists, as well as Mr. Watkin Mills, being heard to advantage in some well-chosen Handelian songs. Mr. C. W. Perkins gave a fine performance of Handel's second Organ concerto in B flat, accompanied by the orchestra. Dr. Sinclair conducted with his customary ability and watchfulness, having complete control over his choral and orchestral forces.

The Midland Musical Society, owing to the engagement of the Town Hall on November 26, changed their locale and gave their concert in the new Central Hall, before a large and appreciative assembly. Coleridge-Taylor's trilogy, 'The Song of Hiawatha,' once more formed the attractive feature of the programme, and it is always a genuine pleasure to listen to this picturesque and appealing music, which so vividly depicts deep emotion. The choristers have on many previous occasions shown that they were in sympathy with the work, but one doubts if they ever realised a more poignant and expressive reading. The orchestra, too, was quite admirable, and Mr. A. J. Cotton, who so ably conducted, had every reason to be gratified with the artistic result attained. The principals, Madame Laura Taylor, Mr. Edwyn Spooner and Mr. Everard Healey, rendered excellent service.

On the same evening Mr. Rutland Boughton gave a Wagner concert in the Town Hall, the executants being the Birmingham New Choral Society, so ably conducted and trained by Mr. Boughton himself. The orchestra was culled from the Birmingham Symphony rank and file. In addition to the Wagnerian selections, the programme included Sir Hubert Parry's choral ode 'Blest pair of Sirens,' in which the fine choir was heard to greatest advantage. Miss Margaret Hoskins (soprano), Mr. William Brown (tenor) and Mr. Montague Borwell were the solo principals.

The Sutton Coldfield Choral Society gave, in the Sutton Coldfield Town Hall, on December 3, a graphic and in every way excellent rendering of Coleridge-Taylor's 'Song of Hiawatha' (Parts I. and II.), under Mr. Joseph H. Adams's able conductorship. This Society is making excellent progress, and is likely to develop into a strong musical organization. The principals were Miss Hattie Mollineux (soprano), Mr. Walter Otley (tenor) and Mr. Walter Morgan (bass). The Sutton Coldfield and Erdington Orchestral Society gave their first concert in the Sutton Coldfield Town Hall on December 10. The programme included selections from Mozart, Schubert, Moszkowski and Elgar. Songs were rendered by Miss Gladys Ashton, and violin solos by Mr. W. J. Claybrook. The conductor was Mr. Clarence Raybould, an excellent musician, organist and pianist. At the Public Hall, Erdington, the Erdington Choral Concert Society gave a performance of Mendelssohn's

'Elijah' on December 14, under Mr. Harold G. Godfrey's conductorship. The principal parts were assigned to Madame Laura Taylor, Madame Marguerite Gell, Mr. Ernest Ludlow and Mr. Ernest Davies. The first visit to Birmingham of the Beecham Opera Company, which occurred during the week commencing December 5, proved an interesting event. Local audiences heard for the first time, at the Prince of Wales's Theatre, some really excellent performances of Offenbach's 'Tales of Hoffmann' and Johann Strauss's 'Die Fledermaus' (The bat). The Royal Society of Artists' Musical Matinées concluded on December 10, it being the 380th concert given under the direction of Mr. Oscar Pollack, covering a period of nineteen consecutive years. On this occasion, Mr. W. Johnson Peters's choir gave some excellent renderings of part-songs, including Elgar's 'The snow,' Festa's 'Down in a flow'ry vale,' Brahms's 'Dim-lit woods,' and Elgar's 'Fly, singing bird.' A feature was Brahms's 'Rhapsody' for contralto solo and male choir, the solo part being splendidly sung by Miss Eva Brookes, the possessor of a rich and sympathetic contralto voice.

The Birmingham Select Choir and Madrigal Society gave a concert at Queen's College on December 12, under Mr. Edwin Stephenson's conductorship. The selection of madrigals and part-song covered a wide range of musical art in unaccompanied choral singing, examples being given from John Wilbye, William Byrd, Orlando di Lasso, Brahms, Stanford, Cornelius, Eaton Fanning, Hubert Parry, Henry Leslie, John Pointer, Moellendorff and Elgar. The Choir is admirably trained and perfect in tone-balance, the voices being of a magnificent and rich quality. The singing throughout denoted intelligence and artistic conception. Violin solos were rendered by Mr. William Henley, and the accompanist was Mr. T. Appleby Matthews.

The terminal orchestral concert in connection with the Midland Institute School of Music was given in the large lecture theatre of that Institution on December 12, under the direction of professor Granville Bantock, the principal. The orchestra, numbering eighty performers, did excellent work. The novelty of the programme was Mr. Willy Lehmann's splendidly orchestrated song 'Ich möchte Weinen,' the vocal portion of which was admirably rendered by Mr. Frank Mullings, our leading local tenor. Miss Zoe Wadely, a teacher of the violin at the School of Music, played Max Bruch's Scottish Fantasia in E flat, Op. 46.

BOURNEMOUTH.

At their second concert of the present season, on December 13, Madame Newling's choir gave a performance of 'The Messiah,' the Municipal Orchestra supplying the instrumental support. Handel's imperishable oratorio has now become an annual institution in Bournemouth, and there is no doubt that the experiment of repeating it periodically has been fully justified by the results from a pecuniary point of view; whether it is wise, from the artistic standpoint, to sacrifice one of the few evenings upon which choral music can be heard to a yearly repetition of such a (dare we say?) hackneyed work, is a question we cannot enter into here. The singing in the choruses somewhat lacked the Handelian massiveness and breadth; during the first hour or so, in particular, the delivery was hesitant and finicking; later, as they warmed to their work, the singers manifested an increasing confidence, and in the 'Hallelujah' and other choruses a vast improvement in the standard of performance was noted. The soloists—Miss Rachel James (soprano), Miss Violet Elliott (contralto), Mr. Sam Hemsall (tenor), Mr. Pedro de Zulueta (bass)—displayed considerable ability in their respective tasks; Miss James was very successful in her rendering of 'Rejoice greatly'; the fine solos which fall to the lot of the contralto were well suited to Miss Elliott's beautiful voice, and Mr. de Zulueta sang with much spirit. The highest distinction, however, was achieved by Mr. Hemsall, the possessor of a delightfully pure and splendidly controlled tenor organ; but we cannot approve of his tampering with the text at the end of 'Thou shalt break them' merely to exploit a high A. Mr. Dan Godfrey, though a victim of temporary indisposition, conducted with his usual earnestness, and the orchestra played the accompaniments (with Mozart's additions) very skilfully.

BRISTOL.

The Sine Nomine Choral and Orchestral Society, on November 26, gave a performance of Mendelssohn's 'St. Paul' at the Victoria Rooms, under the direction of Mr. Robert Simmons. The soloists were Miss Marion Perrott, Miss Gertrude Winchester, Mr. Vivian Bennetts and Mr. William Burt. A creditable interpretation of the oratorio was appreciated by a large audience.

The Bristol Symphony Orchestra gave their first concert for the season on October 7, and an interesting programme was presented at the Victoria Rooms. An opening was made with a new work by Dr. Cyril Rootham, an overture 'To the spirit of comedy.' The composer conducted his work, which favourably impressed the audience. Another novelty was a scena 'O captain! my captain!' a setting of Walt Whitman's stanzas by Mr. Philip Napier Miles, an amateur who has produced some compositions heard with pleasure in London and the provinces. Mr. Davis Brooks was the vocalist, and gave the piece excellently. It is scored for orchestra, and Mr. Miles acted as conductor. Mr. Hubert Hunt directed the performance of other features in the scheme, viz.: the Concerto in B flat for pianoforte and orchestra by Brahms, with Miss Jenny Meid at the solo instrument; and Mozart's 'Jupiter' symphony.

On December 8, at the Victoria Rooms, the Clifton Quintet gave their second performance for the season. The executants were Messrs. Herbert Parsons (pianoforte), Maurice Alexander and Ernest Lane (violins), Alfred Best (viola), and Percy Lewis (violoncello). The principal works given were Schumann's Quartet in A minor (Op. 41, No. 1), and Novak's Pianoforte quintet in A minor (Op. 12). These received satisfactory interpretation, and were listened to with evident delight.

The Bristol New Philharmonic Society, on December 10, attracted a large audience to the Victoria Rooms, and under the direction of Mr. Arnold Barter performed the 'Childhood of Christ' (Berlioz). A portion of the work was given in Bristol many years ago by the Festival Society, under the guidance of Sir Charles Hallé, but the first interpretation of the whole cantata in the city was reserved for the New Philharmonic Society in 1907. So gratifying was the result that a repetition was thought likely to please the musical public. The soloists were Miss Emily Breare, Mr. Henry Tumpenney, Mr. Marcus Thomson, and Mr. Arthur Walenn. Mr. Harold Bernard was the leader of the band. Again the French master's composition gratified the hearers, especially the charming Shepherds' chorus. Afterwards Mendelssohn's 'Hymn of Praise' was given in an effective manner.

CAMBRIDGE.

The term just come to an end has seen an unusual number of concerts given by outside agencies. We have had visits from Messrs. Kubelik and Backhaus, Herr Kreisler, Mr. Arthur Newstead, the Misses Eyre, and others.

The Wednesday concerts of the University Musical Society are now held in the new examination rooms, which are delightful for chamber music. The performers have included the Schwiller and Grimson Quartets. Singers that have appeared are Mr. Thorneley Gibson, Mr. Campbell McInnes, Fräulein Diestel and Herr O. Freytag. At one of the concerts, Borodin's interesting first Quartet was given. A series of orchestral concerts, planned by Dr. Mann, is announced, and the first of the series took place on November 8, when Mr. Henry J. Wood and the Queen's Hall Orchestra took part. The programme included the 'Eroica Symphony.'

Dr. Hugh Blair's 'Harvest-tide' was performed at Holy Trinity Church on Sunday, November 6. The performers numbered about sixty, and Mr. W. T. See conducted.

The chapel of Trinity College is notoriously unfavourable in its acoustic conditions, when full. An interesting experiment was tried on Sunday evening, November 27, when the choir, placed in the ante-chapel, sang a series of unaccompanied motets and anthems, the congregation being seated in the chapel. The result was entirely satisfactory, and it is to be hoped that the experiment will be repeated.

DEVON AND CORNWALL.

THE THREE TOWNS.

Dr. Weekes gave the second of his subscription orchestral concerts on November 23, this being the ninth event on the present basis. The two programmes in miniature were respectively conducted by Dr. Weekes and Mr. Walter Weekes, the former being responsible for a creditable rendering of Tchaikovsky's fifth Symphony, and the latter for Bizet's 'L'Arlesienne' suite, the overture 'Fingal's Cave,' and the 'Britannia' (Mackenzie) overture. The only other orchestral event has been Mr. R. G. Evans's second symphony concert on December 13, at which his carefully trained band gave a highly enjoyable interpretation of Beethoven's first Symphony. The artistic excellence of the wood-wind was proved in the conversational passages of the slow movement, and exquisite attention to details of light and shade and phrasing, with fine control of broad tone in the climaxes, made the performance memorable. The suite, 'La belle au bois dormant,' of Tchaikovsky, was played with finished programmatic effects. Miss Mary Groser, the vocalist, introduced a deeply impressive song by Joseph Holbrooke (orchestrated by Mr. Evans), 'An Outsong.'

Finley Lyon's new cantata 'The great light' was sung at Salisbury Road Baptist Church on November 23, conducted by Mr. John Hawke, with Mr. Leslie Warren at the organ. At St. George's Church, Stonehouse, Mendelssohn's 'Hear my prayer' was sung by the festival choir on December 11, and on December 18 copious selections from 'The Messiah' were sung at the same church, conducted by the vicar, with Mr. W. T. Jenkins at the organ, and also at the church of St. John the Baptist, Devonport, conducted by Mr. A. T. Townsend. At the second of a new series of organ recitals in Emmanuel Church, on November 23, Mr. Reginald Waddy played a 'Reverie' by Granville Bantock and a Melody in E flat by German, both new to Plymouth. On December 12, Mr. Waddy 're-opened' the organ in St. Aubyn's Church, which had been renovated and enlarged at a cost of £157.

Mr. W. T. Jenkins has resigned the organistship of St. George's and has accepted that of St. James-the-Less, vacant through the resignation of Mr. Birch. After four-and-a-half years' honorary labour, Mr. Lewis G. Sydenham has resigned the organ office at George Street Baptist Church; and Mr. T. Martin has resigned from Buckland Monachorum.

'La fille de Madame Angôt' was the opera selected for performance this year by the Plymouth Amateur Operatic Society, of which Mr. Reginald Ball is conductor. The Society occupied the stage of the Theatre Royal throughout the week beginning on November 28. Though smaller than in previous years, the choir was well balanced and did its work well. Among the principals, Mr. Percy Lynch was conspicuously good as Ange Pitou.

On December 14, the Plymouth Orpheus Male-Voice Choir, conducted by Mr. D. Parkes, in a varied programme showed that they were advancing in the right way of part-singing, to more refinement of execution, tone and expression than on previous occasions.

DEVONSHIRE.

Torquay Musical Association, always associated, under its musicianly conductor, Mr. T. H. Webb, with good works, on November 22 played Schubert's 'Unfinished' Symphony and the 'Faust' (Spohr) and 'Euryanthe' (Weber) overtures. In conjunction with the choral force, Parry's setting of 'A song of darkness and light' was given an excellent interpretation, with Madame Emily Squire as soloist. The choir also sang Stanford's part-song 'On a hill' and Schumann's chorus 'Gipsy life.' The Exeter Choral Society, which is vigorous in body and enthusiasm, conducted by Mr. Allan Allen, gave Mendelssohn's 'The first Walpurgis Night' and Elgar's 'Black Knight' on November 23. The sopranos were a little hesitant in the higher register, but the ensemble and effects of light and shade were excellent. On November 22, Miss Gertrude Gauntlett gave a lecture-recital on Mendelssohn, assisted by the Misses G. M. Gauntlett, Katherine Ballen, A. Bayley, Ruby Davey and Mr. Ernest Greenfield. The Exeter Working Men's Society gave an excellent concert on December 7, with assistance from the Misses Violet and Florence Shapcott and Christine Birkett, Messrs. J. Dean Trotter, S. J. Bishop and J. W. Burt; and the 'Isca' Glee Singers gave their annual concert in the city on the same date, singing pieces by Martin, Noll, Smith, Hatton, Ascher, Kinkel and Vincent.

Conducted by the composer, Mr. Hubert Bath, 'The wedding of Shon Maclean' was performed by the Barnstaple Musical Society with great success on November 28. Dr. H. T. Edwards, hon. conductor, obtained musical effects in a number of part-songs and also contributed the pianoforte solos 'Andante spinato' (Chopin), and 'Gigue fantastique,' the latter his own composition. Bude and Stratton Operatic Amateur Society performed 'The brigand's daughter' on December 1. It was a new work, the composition of Miss Forde, of Bude, and was well received.

A new organ was dedicated at St. Swithin's Church, Sandford, on November 23, a recital being given by Mr. Rest Cartwright; and on the same day a similar event took place in the Ivybridge Congregational Church, with a recital by Mr. Harold Lake. At an organ recital given in the Providence Methodist Church, Exeter, on November 29, Mr. Richard Chanter (Christ Church, Woburn Square) played pieces by Rebikoff, and Moussorgsky, an Allegro appassionata, by Harwood, and selected movements by Brahms, Schumann, Tchaikovsky, Elgar and Rheinberger. Mr. C. H. Tonking gave an organ recital in Praise Wesleyan Church on December 1, also contributing violin solos.

At the annual meeting of the Exeter Diocesan Choral Association, it was stated that work was hampered by financial difficulties, the receipts having fallen since 1900 from £244 to £185. Evidence was given of the excellent influence of the Association on country choirs. Mr. W. H. Rogers was re-elected hon. secretary, the Archdeacon of Exeter was elected hon. treasurer, and Mr. T. Roylands-Smith consented to continue his much appreciated work as hon. conductor.

DUBLIN.

The Dublin Orchestral Society, on November 30, gave a concert in the Gaiety Theatre. Dr. Esposito, as usual, conducted, and the programme was as follows: Smetana's 'Verkaufte Braut' overture; Svendsen's 'Carnival in Paris'; Bach's Suite in B minor (flute and strings); Wagner's 'Waldweben'; Tchaikovsky's 'Pathetic' symphony.

On December 6 the Philharmonic Society (conductor, Mr. Charles Marchant) gave a performance of 'St. Paul' at the Antient Concert Rooms, which was honoured by the presence of the Lord Lieutenant and the Countess of Aberdeen. The choir sang exceedingly well in their portion of the work.

Both of the above Societies have hitherto been allowed the use of the University Hall in Earlsfort Terrace, but owing to recent changes, the Senate of the National University have been obliged to withdraw their permission, and our larger musical societies are for the present working under great disadvantages, having no suitable hall for concerts on a large scale.

At the Royal Dublin Society, the weekly programmes have been given by the Brodsky Quartet, Sapellnikoff (both attracting huge audiences, Mr. C. W. Perkins (organ), and the Wessely Quartet.

The Brodsky Quartet played a quartet by Volkmann for the first time here, which was greatly appreciated, as was the Beethoven (Op. 127).

Sapellnikoff made a favourable impression as a pianist with phenomenal technique. He selected a good programme of representative music (including the 'Appassionata'), which he played at a great pace.

The Wessely Quartet played Debussy's Quartet and Haydn's 'Emperor' Quartet, and (with M. Grisard as second viola) Mozart's Quintet in G minor.

At the Sunday Orchestral Concerts, Dr. Esposito has conducted Beethoven's fifth, Schubert's 'Unfinished,' Mozart's 'Jupiter,' and Haydn's B flat Symphonies. The soloists have included Herr A. Wilhelm (violin), Mr. Clyde Twelvrees (violinello), Mr. H. Leeming (flute), Mr. Patrick Delany (violin), Mr. S. Rosenberg (violinello) and Dr. Esposito (pianoforte). The vocalists included

Mr. J. C. Browner, Miss Lena Munro, Miss Alice Rafter, Mr. Percy Whitehead, Mr. Arthur MacCallum and Miss Bessie McKisack.

On December 13, the Amateur Orchestral Society, conducted by Mr. J. F. Larchet, gave a concert, the chief item of which was the incidental music to Sygne's play, 'Heidre of the sorrows,' composed by the conductor. Miss Lily Christie (soprano) and Mr. S. Rosenberg (violinello) were the soloists.

The Feis Ceoil is fixed for May 8 to 13, 1911.

EDINBURGH.

Messrs. Paterson's orchestral concerts, which are given in the M'Ewan Hall on Monday evenings, continue to draw crowded audiences, and the recently appointed conductor, M. Emil Mlynarski, is winning golden opinions. Among the soloists who have made appearances during the last few weeks have been Madame Donalda, Madame Aino Aklte, Mr. Sapellnikoff and Mr. Mischa Elman.

The Classical Concerts under the management of Mr. James Simpson are also as highly successful as formerly, and at the fourth concert, given in the Music Hall on December 3, the audience were treated to a delightful exposition of wind instrument music by the Société Moderne d'Instruments à Vent, with M. Louis Fleury, the eminent flautist, as leader.

A fine performance of Spohr's 'The last Judgment,' conducted by Mr. John Tait, was given in St. James's United Free Church on November 30. The soloists were Miss Skinner, Miss Urquhart, Mr. Bain and Mr. Brown. Mr. Dämbmann was leader of the orchestra, and Dr. W. B. Ross presided at the organ.

The Edinburgh Amateur Orchestral Society, conductor Mr. T. H. Collinson, gave its first concert of the season in the Music Hall on November 23. The programme included works by Weber, Mendelssohn, Delibes and Nicolai; also Beethoven's seldom heard Triple Concerto for pianoforte, violin, violoncello, and orchestra, the solo parts in which were sustained by Mrs. H. S. Murray, Miss Laidlaw, and Mr. H. S. Murray. The vocalist was Miss Ethel O. Kinloch, who sang acceptably Mozart's 'Non mi dir' and a couple of old English songs.

The first of a series of three chamber concerts was given in St. Andrew's Hall on November 25 by a new local combination consisting of Miss Emily Buchanan, Miss Dorothea Shephard-Walwyn, Miss Dorothy Chalmers, and Mr. D. Millar-Craig. Two string quartets—Mozart's in C major (K. 466) and Brahms's in A minor (Op. 51, No. 2)—constituted the instrumental part of the programme. The performers have all established reputations as soloists, and their ensemble playing revealed qualities of rare excellence. Miss Eva Jamieson and Miss Kate Moir, accompanied by Mr. W. B. Moonie, sang in charming style duets by Brahms, Lane Wilson, and Offenbach.

In the cathedral church of St. Mary, on December 2, the combined cathedral choir, conducted by Mr. T. H. Collinson, gave an impressive and much appreciated rendering of Brahms's 'Requiem.' The second of the University Historical Concerts was given in the Music Class Room on December 7, and was devoted to a Couperin-Chopin recital on the harpsichord and pianoforte by Madame Wanda Landowska.

Among other concerts given during the month have been a vocal recital by Mr. A. B. Bach, assisted by his pupils Miss Eugenie Bach, Miss Scott Paterson and Mr. J. Inch Jamieson, with Mrs. Bach at the pianoforte; a pianoforte recital by Miss Jean Nesbitt; and a violin and pianoforte recital by Miss Alix Young and Miss Winifred Christie.

GLASGOW.

The first performance in Scotland of Elgar's 'The Kingdom' was quite worthy of the occasion. The Choral Union, trained by Dr. Coward, sang the opening section ('In the upper room') with fine effect, and they achieved a great success in the 'Pentecost' section, where Elgar's exacting music was sung without the slightest hitch. The solo music, sung by Misses Esta D'Argo and Grainger-Kerr, and

Messrs. Henry Brearley and Herbert Brown, was generally well-rendered, a word of special praise being due to Mr. Brown for his impressive reading of the part of Peter. The Scottish Orchestra, under the composer's incisive bat, played exceedingly well, and Mr. J. E. Hodgson did good service at the organ. The Bach Choir and the Amateur Orchestral Society joined forces and gave a noteworthy concert on November 24 (too late to be noticed last month). The choral programme included selections from three cantatas, viz., 'God goeth up with shouting,' 'Praise Jehovah in His splendour,' and 'My spirit was in heaviness,' and in these the Bach Choir, conducted by Mr. J. M. Diack, sang with fine intelligence. Notable features were the good attack, the crispness, and the clear enunciation, as well as the freedom which results from having the music well memorised. The accompaniments were effectively played by the Amateur Orchestra, judiciously supplemented by Mr. Herbert Walton at the organ. The chief orchestral number on the programme was Mendelssohn's 'Italian' Symphony, of which a good account was given by the orchestra under Mr. W. T. Hoeck. The first and last movements, although revealing some weakness in two of the string sections, were played with considerable spirit, and the charming interweaving of the flutes in the Andante was brought out quite nicely. The solo music in the cantatas was sung by Miss Grainger-Kerr and Messrs. Stanley Newman and Richard Metcalfe. The Classical Concerts of the Choral and Orchestral Union continue to maintain the high level of artistic excellence expected from a conductor of Mr. Emil Mlynarski's powers. At the third concert, on November 29, a fine performance of Haydn's symphony 'La Reine de France' was given, and Smetana's symphonic poem 'Sarka' was brought to a first hearing here. Madame Donalda, as vocalist, was also an attraction. Mr. Mischa Elman was soloist at the fourth concert, on December 6, when he gave a virile rendering of Dvorák's Violin concerto in A minor. The programme likewise included Brahms's second Symphony, and a novelty in the shape of the overture to Glinka's 'Russlan and Lioudmilla.'

On December 13, the Choral Union, under Dr. Coward, gave a performance of Bach's Mass in B minor. In the 'Qui tollis' and in the 'Crucifixus' the choral singing was very impressive, but while the more florid movements were often sung with great brilliance, there were moments when clearness was sacrificed. The soloists were Misses Jenny Taggart and Alice Lakin and Messrs. John Harrison and Peter Dawson; and the Scottish Orchestra, with Mr. J. E. Hodgson's efficient aid at the organ, played the accompaniments. The Saturday Popular Orchestral Concerts continue to attract large audiences. An outstanding feature was the remarkably fine performance of Dvorák's 'New World' symphony, on December 10.

The Western Amateur Orchestral Society, a highly enterprising body, ably conducted by Mr. John MacTaggart, gave a successful concert on December 16. The programme, which had the merit of being unhackneyed, included a first performance here of 'The Forest' symphony, a composition by the little-known 18th century composer J. L. Ellerton. Mr. Charles Tree was the vocalist. On the same evening there was produced 'The Kink,' a comic opera by a young local musician, Mr. G. H. Martin. The music proved to be easy and tuneful, and evidently modelled on Sullivan or German.

At the second of Mr. A. M. Henderson's Chamber Concerts, on December 8, a most interesting programme of duets for two pianofortes was played by Mr. Henderson and Mr. James Friskin. Some songs, beautifully sung by Mr. Gervase Elwes, provided the necessary variety. At her pianoforte recital on December 16, Madame Curzon Watt again proved herself a performer of remarkable ability.

LIVERPOOL AND DISTRICT.

At the fourth concert of the Philharmonic Society on November 22, Dr. F. H. Cowen conducted one of the finest performances of Elgar's 'Variations' ever given here, and Mr. Kreisler's playing in Brahms's Violin concerto was unsurpassably great. The vocalist was Madame Julia Culp, a most accomplished Lieder singer, and the choir was heard in Dvorák's 'Blossoms born of teeming Springtime,' from his oratorio 'St. Ludmila.' The fifth concert, on December 6, was conducted by Mr. Henry J. Wood, whose reading of Tchaikovsky's fifth Symphony did not universally commend itself, although it is certain that the fine orchestra has never played with more force and refinement. Mr. Wood's attention to matters of detail was usefully employed upon the choir, whom he drilled into great responsiveness in singing Sullivan's Choral Epilogue from the 'Golden Legend.' The vocalist was Madame Kirkby Lunn, less effectively heard in Isoldé's 'Liebestod' than in music more suited to her range in Berlioz's 'La Captive,' and especially in Saint-Saëns's 'La fiancée du timbalier.'

A new society, the Oxtou and Cloughton Orchestral Society, a capital organization chiefly of amateur players, gave an excellent programme in the Birkenhead Town Hall on December 10, when Mrs. A. J. Bamford cleverly played Saint-Saëns's G minor Pianoforte concerto, and Mr. Albert Garcia sang, accompanied by Dr. Stanley Dale. Mr. J. E. Matthews was the careful and competent conductor.

The fourth concert given by the Vasco Akeroyd Symphony Orchestra on November 29 was devoted to Tchaikovsky and Wagner, represented by a careful performance of the former's fifth Symphony (greatly differing from Mr. Wood's reading in the same hall a week later), and Wagner's 'Siegfried' Idyll and overture to the 'Flying Dutchman.' The vocalist was Madame Susan Strong. The concerts continue to receive encouraging public support.

A large audience assembled in the Philharmonic Hall on December 8 to hear the Post Office Choral Society's performance of Parts 1 and 2 of the 'Creation,' which was well rendered by a choir and orchestra of 250, conducted by Mr. Percival Ingram. The vocal principals were Madame Anna Shergold, Mr. Henry Turnpenney and Mr. Jackson Potter. The miscellaneous items included Bishop's 'Now by day's retiring lamp,' sung with spirit and precision.

Concerts on the Cheshire side of the Mersey have included performances by the Liscard Orchestral Society, conducted by Mr. Philip Smart, on November 26, and by the Birkenhead Glee and Madrigal Society, an excellent combination of male voices conducted by Mr. J. C. Clarke, on November 24.

The eleventh annual concert of the Liverpool Village Choir was given in the Philharmonic Hall, on December 10. Composed of children's voices only, drawn from the elementary schools, and conducted by its founder, Mr. R. T. Edwards, the singers have at various festivals obtained twenty-two first prizes, two seconds, and one third in twenty-five contests—no mean record since 1900.

The Ormskirk Musical Association gave a successful concert on November 30, when they performed Gounod's 'Faust' (Novello's concert selection). The vocal principals were Miss Mary Langdon, Mr. George Barnett, and Mr. J. C. Brien. The band and chorus of 120 were conducted by Mr. John Ball.

At their first subscription concert in the Parr Hall, on November 23, the Warrington Musical Society, conducted by Mr. F. H. Crossley, performed Elgar's 'Dream of Gerontius' in a highly satisfactory manner, assisted by Miss Phyllis Lett, Mr. H. Turnpenney and Mr. Charlesworth George, and a choir and augmented orchestra numbering 250. As a prelude, Elgar's 'Sursum corda' was played by the strings, brass and organ.

A new concert contralto, Miss Amalfi, who is of local origin, made a successful début at the Kubelik-Bachhaus recital on December 3. She possesses an exceptional voice of even and sympathetic quality, and in addition to her local training has studied under Madame Marchesi and Mr. Henschel with evident advantage.

The concert given by the pupils of the Liverpool College of Music on November 30, afforded further evidence of promising talent among the singers and instrumentalists, who did credit to their teachers. Another interesting annual event was Mr. John Lawson's pupils' concert in St. George's Hall on November 16. In both cases the performances showed the value of systematic training on a sound basis.

Mr. W. L. Tomlins, of Chicago, recently completed his second course of lectures to teachers in the elementary schools of this city, and prior to his departure was entertained at the University Club by officials of the local Education Department and others interested.

At Mr. Filson Young's fourth lecture, on November 25, in connection with the University Music Lectures Association, his subject was 'The musician as hearer.' He criticised the conventional orchestra of 100 which was employed in concert-rooms of varying dimensions, and considered that half the enjoyment was lost in such places from various causes. The literary interpretation of music in the form of the modern annotated programme he considered a snare, and overdone. Everyone's mental image should be made from the music itself. To illustrate his meaning, Chopin's Impromptu in A flat was played three times over by Mrs. R. A. Axtens (a former pupil of Madame Schumann), and the hearers were asked to listen to the music with three different interpretations in their minds; the second and third of which, widely dissimilar, were read by Mr. Young, the first had been previously left to each hearer. We led irrational lives in generally listening to music late in the evening, when the body was tired.

At his fifth lecture, on December 9, Mr. Young's subject was 'Music in four dimensions': Religious (J. S. Bach), Domestic (Mendelssohn), Social (Chopin), Human (Wagner). He said that Bach's religious music was the supreme example. Everything had a rhythm, as for example, the ticking of a watch, and the tides of the sea, which had rhythms of six hours' duration. Bach's rhythms were of great length, rhythms of patterns of notes, and while he bound himself to rules which modern composers discarded, his music had a dignity and calm which soothed the mind, and his religious music had a grave sweetness, never flippant, never gay. Handel had not such a keen sense of rhythm as Bach, and the religion of the choral music in the 'Messiah' was chiefly expressed by massiveness and dignity. The airs in the 'Messiah,' especially the 'borrowed' airs, were not religious music. Mendelssohn's music has not withstood the test of time, yet he had brought music into the house and made it a domestic thing. He did small things perfectly, and his 'Lieder ohne Worte' was an epoch-making work. His music to many conveyed memory and association, precious qualities to be found in its formal melodies and definite, simple rhythms. Chopin's music was an expression of the great world, and of Paris of the 19th century. Its causes were not perhaps worthy, but Chopin had added new elements to music in expressing moods and emotions. He was truly a creative genius. Wagner had lifted music out of all convention, and had made opera reasonable and beautiful. His music had always an idea ready to illustrate, unlike some composers who left one in doubt as to whether they were attempting to depict a soul in agony or a thunderstorm. His music was a completion of something else, and provided musical expression for all emotions which can be so expressed.

The subject of the final lecture, on December 16, was 'Music and Religion, a union and a divorce.' Mr. Young said his own opinion was that music was a living thing, whereas religion was a dying thing in the world to-day. The music associated with religious worship in England was in a very low and unworthy condition. In its modern development music had no sympathy with religion, and he recommended the use of ancient plain-song or German chorales for congregational purposes.

The recently formed Walton Philharmonic Society, conducted by Mr. Albert Orton, performed Sterndale Bennett's 'May Queen' on December 15, the pianoforte accompaniments being played by Mr. Branscombe. The choir of sixty voices sang well.

Mr. Allen Gill, conductor of the Alexandra Palace choir, was a welcome visitor on December 17, when he lectured to the local section of the I.S.M. in the St. George's Hotel on 'Choral Music from very early times to Palestrina.' A feature was the delightful singing of music by Morley, Lassus, and Palestrina, by a choir specially trained and conducted by Dr. A. W. Pollitt.

The Welsh Choral Union added to their laurels by a superb performance of Mendelssohn's 'Elijah' on December 17, when they were associated with an exceptionally good quartet of vocal principals in Miss Jenny Taggart, Miss Mabel Braine, Mr. Gervase Elwes, and Mr. Thorpe Bates, who achieved special distinction. This young baritone's career will be watched with interest. Mr. Harry Evans was an inspiring conductor.

MANCHESTER AND DISTRICT.

After all the weeks of doubt and hesitation, Mr. Ernest Denhof has now decided to put his fortunes to the touch, and we are to have the 'Ring' dramas next April; there is reason to believe that the scheme, having emerged from a somewhat nebulous state, will now attract still more definite support from the public, although the earlier date fixed will inconvenience some possible patrons. Musically, 'Young Manchester' seems to be mobilising as rapidly, and with as resolute purpose, as it has done politically, for the membership of the new Manchester Musical Society has jumped 150 since last I wrote. A body of this sort, all of one mind, can be of great use to the cause of musical progress here, because if it were urged by, say, any of the orchestral societies that it were inexpedient on account of expense to produce some big work not yet heard, they could reply, 'we are organized, and will help to make your audience a bigger one than it would be otherwise,' and the introduction of such a spirit of co-operation into the city's musical life would have wider and more far-reaching effects than would be immediately apparent.

It was a bold idea on the part of Dr. Richter to place Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony in juxtaposition with Strauss's 'Zarathustra' symphonic poem at the sixth Hallé concert, but Beethoven should not follow Strauss, for whether we like it or not, the great modern spoils our palate, and Beethoven, even when gloriously played, seems colourless. Are we not apt to lose sight of the fact occasionally that the placidity of the early symphonic art could not possibly be the expression of our restless modern life and thought? Music should make us think and feel intensely in one vivid moment, and only great, vital imaginations can do that. Nobody can even distantly approach Richter's splendour of conception in that great elemental tone-picture of sunrise, with its booming nature ground-tone, nor in the sweep of that 'Tanzlied' of the 'Uebereinschen.' 'Zarathustra' reveals more fully than almost any other modern work the monumental side of Richter's art.

Mr. Willy Hess, in Max Bruch's D minor Concerto and Saint-Saëns's 'Rondo Capriccioso,' was revealed as a player with a technique of almost flawless perfection.

The Wagner operatic evening, on December 1, brought us the Steersman choruses from the third act of the 'Flying Dutchman,' which opened very shakily, but improved as the work progressed. The Vassals' choruses from Act 2 of 'Lohengrin' were sung lustily, but never conveyed the impression that, in rowing parlance, the choir 'sat well above its work.' These two selections were probably new to the great majority of the choir, who probably also possessed little idea of the relative balance of orchestral and choral parts, and as there had been no joint rehearsal, the moments of hesitation may be explainable partly for these reasons. In Act 3 of 'Tannhäuser' everybody was on surer ground, and a corresponding improvement was to be noted. Miss Agnes Nicholls, Mr. Barron Berthald and Mr. Richard Evans were the soloists, a very keen interest being displayed in the last-named singer from Bolton—who, like many other Lancashire vocalists, had left arduous manual toil in pit, foundry, or factory, for an artistic career—a very high baritone with clear, ringing voice.

Even Dr. Richter can rarely have conducted a more finely inspired performance of Beethoven's Symphony (No. 7) than that of December 8. Not for many a long day has such a finely drawn pianissimo tone been heard from the Hallé string players. Two movements from Mackenzie's incidental music to 'Manfred' were also in the programme; but a more representative work of this composer's might easily have been chosen. It must be said that, apart from Elgar and Bantock, Dr. Richter has not been happy in his selection of English composers' works.

It does not lead to the lot of many solo pianists to play at the Hallé and Gentlemen's Concerts, as well as at the Brodsky and Schiller-Anstalt chamber-music concerts, but this rare distinction has been deservedly bestowed upon Mlle. Johanne Stockmarr. Saving only Carreño, she is the most virile lady pianist heard here in the last fifteen years.

The ninth Hallé Concert, on December 15, brought one of the rare visits paid by her native place by Madame Kirkby Lunn, whom Sir Charles Santley has described as our solitary great British lyrical singer. Dr. Richter is beginning to reap the harvest of a persistent preaching of the gospel according to Richard the Third, for 'Don Juan' was actually given the equivalent of an encore! Dvorák's 'New World' Symphony orchestration seemed like sugar-candy after the Straussian mighty harmonies; to the curious in these matters, one may draw attention to the marked resemblance of the principal theme on pp. 63-65 of the miniature score of this Symphony, to one of the most powerful phrases in 'Gerontius.'

At the Gentlemen's Concert on December 7, Miss Agnes Nicholls, to the accompaniments of her husband, gave a recital of art-songs, most of them new to Manchester. A hidden treasure discovered among manuscripts (1614) in the British Museum, and arranged by Arnold Dolmetsch, 'Have you seen but a whyte lillie grow,' was sung with wonderfully appropriate naïveté.

The two Promenade Concerts during the past month under Mr. Speelman have brought interesting things, some excellent orchestral work, and a violoncello player of uncommon quality in Mr. Arnold Trowell. Miss Clara Butterworth sang much better than when heard here a year ago. The plébiscitary method of drawing up a programme (for December 17) finds great favour with the promenade audiences, this plan being adopted at the concluding concert of each half of the season.

Flourishing amateur orchestral societies at Heaton Moor (Mr. Walter Evelyn, conductor), at Altrincham, in which Mr. C. H. Fogg is the leading spirit, and the Manchester Beethoven Society, under Mr. W. Cockerill's direction, have all given concerts of more than average merit during the past six weeks. The Oldham Orchestral Society, also an amateur body, is flourishing exceedingly under Mr. Frederick Dawson's conductorship; here additional interest is lent to the concerts by the appearance of artists like Madame Donalds, Zimbalist, Joseph Holmann, and others.

At the Manchester Vocal Society's second concert, on December 17, a repetition of Brahms's 'Vineta' (heard under the same auspices two months ago) afforded some opportunity for estimating the advance made under Mr. Herbert Whittaker's guidance. Already the leaven of newer and higher ideals, both in the choice of work and the manner of its performance, is beginning to work: Elgar's 'Deep in my soul,' Berlioz's exquisite pastoral 'Thou must leave Thy lowly dwelling,' from the 'Childhood of Christ,' together with lighter items by Stanford, Parry, and Moellendorff, made up a well-varied programme, the most gratifying feature of which was that the exacting Elgar piece held most encouragement for future attainment.

To Mr. Alfred Higson and his Sale and District Musical Society belongs the honour of singing for the first time in Manchester the new works by Delius and Debussy produced recently at the Blackpool festival; and after his animadversions on the first of these works at Blackpool, Dr. A. Herbert Brewer may be interested to learn that both pieces were rapturously applauded by an essentially popular audience, the Debussy chanson 'Cold winter' being doubly encored! If further evidence were needed of the keen appreciation and perception on the part of genuine working-class audiences, the experience of one of Lancashire's 'crack' competitive choirs visiting a big industrial centre not many miles from Manchester may be adduced. Admission to the concert-room was 2d., and every nook and corner of the vast building was crammed, platform as well; works like Brahms's 'Autumn,' Max Bruch's 'Morning song of praise,' Elgar's 'Weary wind of the west,' Saint-Saëns's 'Softly wakes my heart,' or Massenet's 'Pensée d'automne,' were encored. Or again, at the new Albert Hall in Manchester, the centre of evangelical Nonconformity and aggressive social work, the past month has witnessed a most creditable performance by the Nonconformist Choir Union, under Mr. Granville Humphreys, of portions of Bach's 'Christmas Oratorio'—not exactly what would be termed a popular work for the masses.

At the opening concert of the Preston Choral Society the choir took a subordinate position in face of the attractions of Backhaus and Kubelik, along with Mlle. Alice Verlet and Miss Amalfi. The choir, under Dr. E. C. Bairstow, sang the original ten-part version of Pearsall's 'Sir Patrick Spens,' the four-part tenor division disturbing the balance rather seriously in the dramatic episode; the closing section was beautifully sung. The conductor's 'Sweet day so cool' and Stanford's 'Valentine's day' were too ponderously delivered. Brahms's 'O lovely May' concluded the programme.

Postscript.—To the list of pioneer workers here in the cause of Max Reger's music (albeit only very early compositions) might have been added in last month's article the name of Mr. James Richardson.

NEWCASTLE AND DISTRICT.

During the past month two important new British choral works have been heard in Newcastle. On November 30 the forces of the Choral Union and the Hallé Orchestra united under the baton of Mr. Granville Bantock, and gave Parts II. and III. of his 'Omar Khayyâm,' Part I. of which was given at the festival last year. Although here and there a lack of thematic distinction is apparent, and facility of invention leads to undue prolongation, the work made a great impression. It is so gorgeous in hue, the choral and orchestral writing are so original, and the pictorial element has so large a place, that the depressing fatalism of the poem is outweighed by the beauty of the music, and its harsh outlines are softened by the medium which delivers its message. Particular mention must be made of the impressive and beautiful close of Part III. An ideal trio of soloists were Miss Phyllis Lett, Mr. F. Mullings and Mr. Herbert Brown, and the thankless task of the 'Pots' was entrusted to six members of the chorus. Except for a lack of attention to pianissimo on the part both of choir and orchestra, an excellent performance was obtained, the former receiving unreserved and warm commendation by the composer. Miss Lett sang beautifully three of the lovely Sappho songs, and the fanciful comedy-overture, 'The pierrot of the minute,' opened the concert. A work of totally different calibre was Mr. Rutland Boughton's 'Midnight,' conducted by the composer at a concert of the Postal Telegraph Choral Society a week later. Mr. Boughton has no fatal fluency, but seems to have to wrestle fiercely with the medium of expressing his thoughts in a way that frequently reminds one of Beethoven's third period. Undoubtedly the work is one of much power and originality; there are many pages of sheer beauty, and there are tunes of swinging irresistibility which stamp it as the product of a mind formed for great things. The choir grappled manfully with the great difficulties of the vocal parts, and there was a local orchestra. The remainder of the well-chosen programme included an excellent interpretation of Coleridge-Taylor's 'Minnehaha' cantata, under the direction of the conductor of the Society, Mr. E. L. Bainton. The soloists were Miss Lillie Wormald and Mr. N. Allen. Mr. Boughton also delivered an eloquent and thoughtful lecture the following Monday on 'Wagner,' which was brought to a close by the Grail scene from 'Parsifal.'

Other choral Society performances have been: South Shields—'Cavalleria Rusticana' (Mr. M. Fairs); Whitley Bay—Walford Davies's 'Everyman' and part-songs of Delius (soloists, Miss G. Jacobson, Madame Dewhurst, Messrs. R. Ripley and Dan Price); Durham—Sterndale Bennett's 'May Queen,' 'Minnehaha,' and Mozart's G minor Symphony; the Newcastle Glee and Madrigal Society (Mr. J. Liddell); the Tynemouth Amateur Vocal Society (Mr. M. Fairs), who gave 'Judas Macabæus,' with pianoforte and strings—soloists, Misses Jenny Taggart and H. Cragg-James, and Messrs. J. Cheetham and H. Harris; and Jarrow Philharmonic Society (Mr. G. Dodds), who gave a performance of 'Elijah,' which was marked by excellent choral singing. The last three concerts were on December 14. Canon Culley conducted two performances of Part II. of Mendelssohn's 'St. Paul' in the Cathedral, on December 7 and 11. They were given by an augmented choir and string band, the wind parts being tastefully added at the organ by Mr. W. Ellis, but the tempi were generally too fast, and there was not much attention to detail. A small organization at Dunston gave 'Minnehaha' under the baton of Mr. W. Maddock; and on December 12 the Newcastle Catholic Choral Society sang Haydn's first Mass. 'Messiah' performances have been given by the Choral Union (Dr. Coward), Darlington Choral and Orchestral Society (Mr. T. Henderson), and numerous smaller bodies. The Philharmonic Orchestra gave its first matinée concert at the Tyne Theatre on November 24, at which Haydn's 'Clock' Symphony, Mozart's 'Serenade,' Mendelssohn's 'Fingal Overture' and other works were creditably performed. Mr. Rogers conducted. The French Modern Wind Instrument Society gave an interesting programme at a gathering of the Chamber Music Society on December 2. Compositions by Beethoven, Handel, Pierné, Wailly, and Bernard were played with a high degree of finish. Virtuoso visits have been those of the inimitable de Paellmann, and of Kubelik and Backhaus. The violin items were nearly all mere show pieces, but Backhaus distinguished himself by a splendid rendering of Schubert's 'Wanderer Fantasia.'

On December 15, in connection with the Classical Concert Society, Mr. Leonard Borwick gave broad, virile performances of items by Bach, Beethoven and Schumann, and Miss Meta Diestel sang tastefully songs by Schumann and Brahms.

NORWICH AND DISTRICT.

The first concert of the season of the Norwich Philharmonic Society, with which was associated the Norwich Choral Society, took place on December 8 at St. Andrew's Hall, Norwich, when an interesting programme was presented, consisting of the Overture 'William Tell' (Rossini), Symphony in G minor (Mozart), and Mascagni's opera 'Cavalleria Rusticana.' The opera does not lend itself well to a performance on a concert platform, but a very successful rendering was given, the principal artists engaged being Miss Esta D'Argo, Miss Edith Clegg, Madame Lilian Tree, Mr. Harold Wilde, and Mr. Ivor Foster. Dr. Bates conducted, with his usual care and ability.

A crowded audience assembled in St. Andrew's Hall on December 13, when Herr Kubelik and Herr Wilhelm Backhaus made their first appearance in Norwich after the conclusion of their successful provincial tour.

The Saturday Popular Concerts given under the auspices of the Norwich Corporation and the management of Dr. Bunnett are having a very successful season, the attendance showing a great increase on that of the previous year. The fine band of the 16th Lancers has appeared on two occasions, and the Norwich Operatic Company volunteered their services on one evening, when various operatic selections were given, to the great pleasure of the audience assembled.

NOTTINGHAM AND DISTRICT.

On November 22, Miss Rowena Goldberg (pianist) gave a concert, assisted by Miss Pauline Theurer (songs at the harp), Mr. Johan Hock (violinello), and Mrs. Hock (accompanist). The programme contained works by Tchaikovsky, Chopin, Liszt and Brahms. A very successful performance of Benedict's 'Legend of St. Cecilia,' and Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha's Wedding-feast' was given by the Long Eaton Choral Society on November 29. The artists were Miss Mabel Manson, Miss Maud Wright, Mr. Alfred Heather, and Mr. George Utley. The choral work showed decided improvement, and reflected great credit on Mr. J. S. Derbyshire, who conducted.

The Nottingham Sacred Harmonic Society's orchestral concert on December 1 suffered from the political crisis so far as the audience was concerned, but the programme gave great satisfaction. The music selected was entirely English, and contained as novelties, a 'Faerie Suite of three dances' by Mr. Bernard Johnson, and 'Variations on a theme of Handel,' by Dr. Lyon. Mr. Johnson's work is slight and not serious, but gives room to hope for more solid work in the future. The Variations are distinctly clever, and the scoring musically, especially the string writing; doubtless many will be glad to hear Dr. Lyon's work at some future time. Mr. Douthitt contributed songs by Mr. Landon Ronald and Mr. Eric Coates; the latter represented local talent, but the appreciative reception given to his compositions may be attributed to their own distinct merit.

The Sacred Harmonic's performance of the 'Messiah,' on Boxing Day, was announced to be given under Mr. Allen Gill, with Miss Emily Breare, Miss Maud Wright, Mr. James Davis, and Mr. Watkin Mills as soloists.

OXFORD.

The first concert of the term, M. Pachmann's recital, took place on October 25, in the Town Hall instead of in the Assembly Rooms, the latter being inadequate for such an audience as he attracts. A more enjoyable concert could not be imagined. The artist was evidently in the best of health and spirits, and gave some of the works in his programme the finest interpretations they have received in Oxford. On November 3, under the auspices of the Musical Club, Mr. Leonard Borwick and Señor Casals gave a concert of violoncello and pianoforte music. A week later Kubelik and Backhaus gave a concert in the same hall.

An interesting lecture on English folk-songs was given by Dr. R. Vaughan Williams, on November 16, in the new Masonic Hall. At a concert given under the auspices of the Musical Union in the Examination Schools, on November 21, Messrs. T. F. Morris, H. Kinze, Waldo Warner and Ivor James played quartets by Beethoven (Op. 59, No. 2) and Dvorák (Op. 51).

On November 23, in the Town Hall, an excellent orchestral concert was given under Dr. Allen's baton, opening with Bach's Concerto in D minor, for two solo violins accompanied by strings only, in which the soloists were Fräulein A. von Aranyi and Fräulein J. von Aranyi (great-nieces, it is understood, of Joachim). The concerto went well on the whole, and great credit is due to Dr. Allen and the Oxford string players. At the same concert, Mendelssohn's Concerto for violin and orchestra was given, Fräulein A. von Aranyi playing the solo part upon one of the 'Strads' formerly belonging to Professor Joachim.

On November 26, in the Town Hall, Mr. Plunket Greene gave another of his interesting song recitals, accompanied by Sir Charles Stanford, to a large audience. Two days later, in the same building, Mr. Mark Hambourg, assisted by Mlle. Verlet (soprano) and Mr. Arnold Trowell (violin-cello), gave an excellent concert.

On December 6, in the Sheldonian Theatre, the Professor of Music, Sir Walter Parratt, gave a lecture on the interesting subject of 'Carols' to an appreciative audience. The Professor paid a warm tribute to the efforts of Sir John Stainer and Mr. Bramley, of Magdalen College, in their endeavour to resuscitate some of the very best carols, and their collection (published in cheap form by Novello & Co.) has led, said the Professor, to the increased popularity of carol-singing year by year. As to the history of the carol, he said it was, of course, one species of folk-song. The illustrations to the lecture were nicely rendered by a small choir from the Choral Society, under Dr. Allen's able direction, and included a specimen, in two parts only, from the Cowley Carol Book (14th century), another from the collection by Fuller Maitland and W. S. Rockstro (15th century), gradually coming nearer home to a carol by the present Dean of Christchurch, Dr. Strong, 'In the deep mid-winter,' which appears in the new 'Oxford hymn book,' and which the Professor said was not a mere hymn-tune, as many so-called carols were, but contained the true ring of the ancient carol.

The Sunday evening concerts at Balliol College have been continued during the term as usual, under the able direction of Dr. Walker.

SHEFFIELD AND DISTRICT.

PERFORMANCE OF LISZT'S 'ST. ELIZABETH.'

Performances of Liszt's oratorio 'St. Elizabeth' are so rare that especial interest centred in a revival of the beautiful and picturesque work by the Sheffield Amateur Musical Society on December 9. The record of previous performances in England, dating from the first—under Sir A. C. Mackenzie, at St. James's Hall, London, in 1886, when Liszt was present—include those at the Crystal Palace, 1886; Bishop Auckland, 1886; Liverpool, 1894; Newcastle, 1901; Birmingham, 1903; and February 17, 1910, at Manchester, under Dr. Richter.

If the strikingly picturesque performance at Sheffield under Mr. Henry J. Wood be the means of calling attention to this strangely neglected work, the enterprise of the Amateur Musical Society will not have been in vain. The choral portions are not difficult, but, as the event proved, they can be made extremely effective. Though styled an oratorio, 'St. Elizabeth' has hardly anything in common with British notions of that form. Of so-called sacred music there is but little. Only the closing cathedral scene, containing the most imposing music in the work, the chorus of the Poor, and the duet following the Miracle of the Roses, can come under that category. The rest is secular cantata, with leanings towards early Wagnerian opera. The composer's extensive and ingenious use of leading motives knits the work into a more organized whole than otherwise would be the case, for the libretto is based upon the six scenes depicted in the famous frescoes at the Wartburg and, necessarily, its divisions are somewhat disconnected.

Mr. Wood reduced the oratorio to a trifle over two hours in duration by several judicious cuts. The orchestral 'March of crusaders,' with its choral pendant, is largely mere repetition, and can well be omitted; while the orchestral Interludium is not one of the strongest sections in the work. With these and a few other omissions the performance was brought within reasonable concert length. Mr. Wood's tempi were extremely fast in several numbers, and generally he aimed at a highly vitalised and dramatic interpretation which made the hearing of it very interesting. The chorus, though once or twice hampered by the speed, sang with splendid force and warm colouring in the later sections. Their tone-gradations covered a wide range, and they made the funeral march very impressive. Three thoroughly capable soloists—Miss Ada Forrest, Miss Ellen Beck and Mr. Wilfred Douthitt—and a brilliant orchestra, mainly local, completed the ensemble. Help was lent in the production by Mr. J. A. Rodgers, assistant-conductor, and Mr. J. W. Phillips, organist.

The second orchestral promenade concert, given on December 1, was styled a 'classical night.' Mozart's G minor Symphony, Beethoven's 'Leonora' Overture (No. 3), and Mendelssohn's Violin concerto were the chief works. They were played smartly and with fine tone and clean ensemble by the orchestra, who also proved the excellence of their string tone in Bach's 'Brandenburg' Concerto (No. 3), and their all-round merit in the 'Tannhäuser' overture and smaller pieces. In the concerto, Miss Ivonne Astruc made a marked impression. Her tone is surprisingly rich, and she phrases so beautifully and has so neat a technique that she stirred the audience to enthusiasm. Miss Gertrude Haworth gave an artistic and very intelligent performance of Mozart's 'Non più di fiori,' and other songs.

The Philharmonic Probationary Orchestra is progressing so much that at their opening concert they essayed Beethoven's Symphony (No. 1) under Mr. J. H. Parkes. They played it with intelligence and care, and were nearly as good in some movements from Tchaikovsky's 'Casse Noisette' Suite.

The Senior Philharmonic Orchestra gave further evidence of steady progress at the opening concert of their season. Mr. Parkes directed capable performances of Mozart's 'Jupiter' symphony, Tchaikovsky's 'Capriccio Italien,' and other pieces.

Another flourishing orchestral body is the Amateur Instrumental Society, which Mr. J. Duffell directs. A well-prepared performance of Mendelssohn's 'Italian' symphony was the chief feature of their winter concert.

The Sharrow Choral and Orchestral Society is an earnest little organization, well trained by Mr. O. C. Owrid. There was much to commend at their opening concert, at which they gave Parry's 'Ode on St. Cecilia's Day' and Mendelssohn's 'Athalie.'

Among other interesting concerts of a busy month may be mentioned those of the Sheffield Choral Union ('Judas Maccabæus,' conductor Mr. H. Reynolds), the Rotherham Choral Society (Mr. Thomas Brameld), the St. Oswald's Musical Society (Mr. J. C. Simon) and the Norton Lees Choral Society (MacCunn's 'Lay of the last minstrel'). A well-rehearsed and very creditable performance of 'King Olaf' by the Victoria Hall Society, under Mr. H. C. Jackson, is also to be recorded.

A large number of 'Messiah' performances, headed by the annual one given by the Sheffield Musical Union under Dr. Coward, have, as usual, characterized the closing days of December.

YORKSHIRE.

LEEDS.

On November 3, at the first of the Leeds Philharmonic concerts, Dr. Richter conducted the Choral symphony, together with a series of extracts from 'Parsifal,' of which the Grail scene was the most important. The reading of the symphony was marked by his accustomed dignity, and if the Scherzo lost something in brilliance, it seemed more in keeping with the general character of the great work. The soloists were the Hon. Mrs. Julian Clifford, Miss Dewhurst, Mr. Brearley and Mr. Marsden Williams, and the last-named artist's reading of the baritone recitative deserves a word of especial praise. Three of the excellent Municipal Orchestral Concerts—now 'municipal' only in name—have to be chronicled. That their educational side is not neglected is shown by the fact that at these three concerts Beethoven's three 'Leonora' overtures have been performed in turn, affording a most interesting opportunity of comparison. The symphonies presented have been Beethoven's 'Pastoral' (November 26), Brahms in D (December 3), and Tchaikovsky in E minor (December 17). Mr. E. L. Bainton conducted his 'four dances,' which are good as music, but have hardly sufficiently marked characteristic rhythms to answer to their names. Mr. Baynton Power played the solo in Saint-Saëns's brilliant 'Africa' fantasia with great facility and sparkle, and Mr. Nathan introduced the Adagio and Finale of Brahms's Violin concerto. Tchaikovsky's 'Romeo and Juliet' fantasia was one of the less familiar features of the concerts, in which the orchestra, under Mr. Fricker, showed its all-round efficiency. A series of preparatory lectures on the programmes, given by local musicians before the concerts, are proving, to students and others, a help to their enjoyment. On November 30, the Leeds Choral Union, under Dr. Coward, gave the 'Samson and Delilah' of Saint-Saëns. Miss Dilya Jones sang the part of Delilah with good effect, and was ably seconded by the tenor, Mr. Henry Brearley, while the choir sang with their accustomed power. Among the choral performances must be reckoned an admirable one of Brahms's 'German Requiem,' at the Parish Church, on December 2. Dr. Bairstow conducted, his assistant, Mr. Bullock, played the organ with much judgment, and the addition of kettledrums added greatly to the characteristic effect of the music. The baritone solo was artistically sung by Mr. Browning, the principal bass of the choir, and though the soprano air lost a good deal by being entrusted to four choirboys, they sang it with remarkable unanimity. The choral singing was altogether excellent, and the work made a great impression, its solemnity and its deep emotion being strongly felt.

If choral and orchestral concerts are somewhat at a discount at Leeds just now, we are having more chamber concerts than usual, though, as is commonly the case, they seem to appeal to only a very limited section of the musical community. On December 6, the Leeds Trio (Messrs. Cohen, Schott, and Herbert Johnson) made their first appearance under that title, and played with an ensemble that indicated very careful preparation. Volkmann's powerful but comparatively little-known Piano-forte trio in B flat minor, and César Franck's equally unfamiliar Trio in F sharp minor, both works of very great interest. On the following evening, at the Leeds Bohemian concert, Reger's strange String quartet in D minor had, as an effective set-off, Schubert's great work in G (Op. 161), which received a very efficient interpretation from Messrs. Elliott, Wright, Moxon, and Drake. On December 14, the Rasch Quartet concert included a String quartet by Poggendorf (Op. 3) and Arensky's Piano-forte quintet in D (Op. 51), with Mr. Percy Richardson as the pianist. The ensemble was excellent throughout. On November 28, Messrs. Rasch, Giessing, and Lloyd Hartley, with the help of Mrs. Albert Joseph as vocalist, gave a concert at which piano-forte trios by Tchaikovsky and Sinding were introduced, and on December 5, Miss Ella Child gave a piano-forte recital at which she played in brilliant style pieces by Debussy and some earlier French composers, and introduced, with the assistance of Miss Alice Simpkin, Busoni's second Sonata for piano-forte and violin. Recitals by Miss Lilian Prust (November 21) and Miss Brooke (December 5) also call for mention, as does a very successful concert given by Miss Agnes Nicholls, on December 12, in aid of a local charity. At the concert of the Leeds Symphony Society, an amateur organization, on December 13, Mr. Grimshaw conducted a Haydn symphony, and some music of lighter character; and on the same evening Zimbalist, with Mr. Charlton Keith as pianist, gave a violin recital at one of Messrs. Haddock's Musical Evenings.

BRADFORD.

At the Bradford subscription concert, on December 9, Gerardy appeared in a Haydn Violoncello concerto in D, or at least in two movements thereof, for, to shorten the programme, the Finale was omitted. The symphony was Schubert's 'Unfinished' which, strange as it may appear, does not seem to have been heard at these concerts for something like twenty years, and was finely played by the Hallé Orchestra under Dr. Richter, while among the most brilliant performances were those of a Suite for strings by Bach and the 'Academic overture' of Brahms. On November 25, the Festival Choral Society, under Dr. Cowen, gave a performance of 'Elijah' that had all-round merit, the soloists being Miss Esta D'Argo, Miss Lucy Nuttall, Mr. Brearley and Mr. Herbert Brown. The concert of the Bradford Permanent Orchestra, on December 10, was conducted by Mr. Fricker, who took the place of Mr. Allen Gill and gave excellent performances of Tchaikovsky's fourth Symphony (omitting the first movement), and the 'Oberon' and 'Leonora' (III.) overtures. Miss Mabel Manson and Mr. Elstub were vocalists of more than average distinction. Some concerts promoted by the Bradford Arts Club deserve mention. On November 23, a programme of modern French music was undertaken by Madame Barbier, and on December 5 the Rawdon Briggs Quartet gave a second chamber concert.

OTHER TOWNS.

At Wakefield, chamber music has been for many years past represented chiefly by the concerts promoted by two Wakefield ladies, the Misses Clarkson, and on December 8 they celebrated the completion of twenty-five years' work by an invitation concert, at which Miss Agnes Nicholls, with Mr. Harty at the piano-forte, sang a number of highly interesting songs, and Miss Kathleen Chabot gave an artistic and sensitive reading of Schumann's G minor Sonata, with other works. The programme contained, in a list of musicians who have appeared at the concerts, a striking evidence of the high standard which they have upheld, and it is satisfactory to note that the interest felt in them shows no sign of falling off.

In the City of York the Symphony Orchestra, under Mr. Noble's direction, gave a concert on November 28, the programme of which included Mr. Edward German's 'Welsh Rhapsody,' written for Cardiff in 1904, and on December 5 the York Musical Society, also conducted by Mr. Noble, gave two delightful works of old time, Handel's 'Acis and Galatea' and Bach's 'Sleepers, wake.' Save that a little more vivacity would have suited Handel's Masque, the performance was worthy of the society. The soloists—Miss Norah Newport, Mr. Brearley, and Mr. Higley—were all most efficient, and Mr. Higley's genial impersonation of 'the giant Polypheme' was quite in accord with the character of the work. A recital given on November 30 by Miss Florence Taylor, a highly promising young vocalist, deserves a passing notice.

At Hull, on November 23, the Vocal Society, of which Dr. G. H. Smith is the conductor, gave an excellent choral performance of Sullivan's 'Martyr of Antioch,' followed by a miscellaneous assortment of pieces by the same composer. The soloists, Miss Evans Williams, Miss Mostyn, Mr. Cheetham and Mr. Lycett, were generally efficient. On December 2 the Hull Philharmonic Society, under Mr. J. W. Hudson, gave Tchaikovsky's E minor Symphony, together with Schumann's 'Genoveva' overture and Elgar's 'Wand of Youth' suite. Miss Alice Verlet was the vocalist. At an afternoon service in Ripon Cathedral, on December 4, Schumann's 'Requiem' was given, under the direction of the organist, Mr. C. H. Moody, and the occurrence is of sufficient rarity to deserve notice. The Ripon Choral Society, on December 13, gave Dvorák's 'Spectre's Bride,' also under Mr. Moody's conductorship. Miss Maud Wilby was the soprano, Mr. F. Mullings the tenor, and, in the absence of the baritone, Mr. Moody showed his versatility by singing the Narrator's part.

The Halifax Choral Society is, in the absence of its conductor, Mr. English, under the temporary charge of Mr. Fricker, who conducted on November 24 a most spirited and finished performance of Elgar's 'King Olaf,' as well as of the 'Cockaigne' overture and the 'Bavarian Highlands' suite. The choir has seldom, if ever, sung with such freedom and precision, and the difficult music of Olaf had just the right sense of breeziness and force. The soloists were Miss Evans-Williams, Mr. William Green, and Mr. Peter Dawson. On November 29 the Morley Choral Society, which is also under Mr. Fricker, gave Handel's 'Samson,' and on the same date Van Bree's 'St. Cecilia's Day' was given by the Keighley Musical Union, under Mr. R. H. Moore's conductorship. On December 6 the Huddersfield Glee and Madrigal Society gave a programme of choral music under Mr. J. W. Armitage's direction, the choir singing old and new compositions with good effect. Mr. Fricker contributed some organ solos.

The latter work again made a deep impression by reason of its beauty and richness of expression. A Motet by Grabert, Wilhelm Berger's chorus 'Charfreitag,' Hans Fitzen's 'Colombus,' the interesting Motet 'Mein Odem ist schwach,' by Max Reger, and scenes from Wagner's 'Parsifal' constituted the programme of the 'Busstagskonzert' given by the Königlicher Opernchor (conductor, Professor Hugo Rüdel) in the newly rebuilt Royal Opera House. At the second concert of the Philharmonischer Chor (conductor, Professor Siegfried Ochs), Max Reger's setting for chorus, orchestra, and organ of the rooth Psalm was performed for the first time in Berlin. introduced Walter Braunfels's interesting Symphonic variations on an old French children's tune, and Friedrich Klose's finely scored 'Elfenreigen.' 'Sea-drift' and 'Brigg Fair' have been performed for the first time, the former by the Rühliche Gesangverein, under Herr Carl Schuricht, and the latter at the first symphony concert in the Opera House, under Dr. Rottenberg. At the Friday concerts of the Museum-gesellschaft, first performances have been given of Strässer's second Symphony and Rachmaninoff's third Pianoforte concerto, of which the solo part was finely played by the composer. — Sinding's rarely-heard D minor Symphony was greatly appreciated on its recent revival at the same institution.

GUERNSEY.—The first combined festival of surpliced choirs (seven in number, forming an aggregate of 200 voices) was held on November 10, in the parish church of St. Peter Port. Mr. W. Crouzaz was the organist, and Mr. J. Matthews, organist of St. Stephen's Church, the conductor. The anthem was Eaton Faning's 'O how amiable.' The choral singing was considered the finest that has been heard in the town church for many years.

HAWARDEN.—The annual concert of the County School is always of considerable interest, because of its ambitious character. On November 30 the School Choir, in conjunction with the District Male-Voice Choir, gave an excellent performance of Cliffe's 'Ode to the North-east wind.' An orchestra with a nucleus of Hallé players did justice to the difficult orchestral parts. The School Choir also sang Elgar's three-part song 'The snow,' accompanied by the strings of the orchestra, with great effect. The Male-Voice Choir, apart from their share of Cliffe's work, gave a good account of themselves in W. Davies's 'Hymn to action.'

HAYWARD'S HEATH.—A very successful concert was given by the Musical Society before a large audience in the Public Hall on November 22. Elgar's 'Banner of St. George,' the chief work, was efficiently interpreted by the choir and orchestra of about sixty members. In the absence, through indisposition, of Mr. Reginald J. Beckett, the baton was wielded by Mr. A. W. Abdey. Miss Clara J. Lott was the accompanist.

HEREFORD.—At the Choral Society's concert on November 22, a varied programme included Parry's 'Ode to St. Cecilia's Day' and Elgar's 'From the Bavarian Highlands,' as its chief features. The choir lived up to the high standard that Dr. Sinclair requires and obtains from those under his control. The orchestra played Grieg's 'Peer Gynt' Suite. Vocal items were contributed by Miss Norah Newport and Mr. W. R. Batey, and Mr. T. Henry Smith gave violin solos.

INVERCARGILL (NEW ZEALAND.)—The Musical Union gave their third and last concert of the season on October 11 in the Municipal Theatre, with an interesting programme entirely devoted to the works of Elgar. The chief feature was the choral and orchestral suite 'Scenes from the Bavarian Highlands.' The other choral works were the epilogue from 'The Banner of St. George,' 'O happy eyes,' 'Fly, singing bird,' 'The snow,' 'My love dwelt in a Northern land,' and 'Weary wind of the West.' Mr. C. Gray conducted the orchestra of twenty-three players and a choir, which was constituted as follows: 47 sopranos, 19 altos, 11 tenors, and 24 basses. The soloists were Miss McGruer and Mr. H. Richards.

LEAMINGTON.—An Elgar programme was chosen by the Madrigal Society for their concert, given on December 8 at the Winter Hall, in aid of the Hospital Saturday Committee Fund. 'The Black Knight' was the principal work, and was capably interpreted. Perhaps greater effect was secured in the unaccompanied numbers, such as 'Go, song of mine' and 'O happy eyes.' The programme also included the Epilogue from 'The Banner of St. George' and 'Stars of the summer night.' Mr. E. Roberts West conducted. In the place of Miss Marie Brema, still occupied in London with her Savoy productions, Miss Grainger-Kerr sang the 'Sea pictures.'

LEYBURN (WENSLEYDALE).—The combined choirs of Wesley and Leyburn churches gave their first concert on November 23 with great success. The choral numbers were the Gipsy chorus from 'The Bohemian girl,' Faning's 'There is dew for the flow'ret,' and Garrett's 'O my love's like the red, red rose.' The orchestra played the Serenade from Elgar's 'The wand of youth.' Miscellaneous solo items were contributed by Mrs. Frederick Riddell, Mr. C. A. Flintoff and Mr. J. W. Cowper. Mr. Herbert E. Brooke conducted.

LINCOLN.—On November 30 the Musical Society gave an excellent performance of Elgar's 'King Olaf,' which did complete justice to the dramatic opportunities of the work. Their treatment of 'The challenge of Thor,' 'A little bird in the air,' and 'The maidens' chorus' may be singled out for special praise. The soloists, Miss Euneta Truscott, Mr. Webster Millar and Mr. Joseph Lycett sang their music with artistic effect. In the second part of the programme Sir Frederick Bridge's 'Crossing the bar' was performed as a tribute to the memory of the late Dean Wickham. The orchestra, besides supplying the accompaniments, played Tchaikovsky's 'Casse-Noisette' Suite. Dr. G. J. Bennett conducted with his usual ability.

MIDDLESBROUGH.—The programme of the eighty-ninth concert of the Musical Union, held in the Town Hall on December 7, consisted of Elgar's 'The Black Knight' (for chorus and orchestra), and Bridge's 'Flag of England' (for soprano soloist, chorus and orchestra), in which Miss Alice Baxter ably sustained the solo part. The choir of over 200 members gave a splendid account of themselves in these two works, singing with confidence, and maintaining the high standard the patrons of these concerts are accustomed to. The orchestra of sixty players, mostly local amateurs, acquitted themselves with all credit in the orchestral accompaniments to these works and to Beethoven's 'Emperor' Concerto, in which the pianist was Miss Tina Lerner. Mr. Nicholas Kilburn conducted.

NEWPORT (MON.).—Mackenzie's 'Dream of Jubal' was the chief feature of the concert given by the Choral Society on November 24. It was evident that the conductor, Mr. Arthur E. Sims, had bestowed great pains in training the choir, and the choral portions of the cantata received an adequate and spirited rendering. The orchestra was hardly so satisfactory, owing to the fact that only one rehearsal was possible. Miss Mabel Manson (who replaced Miss Amy Evans at a few hours' notice) was excellent in the soprano solo music, and Mr. Henry Turnpenney sang the 'Song of the sickle' very effectively. Mr. Charles Fry was once more the able exponent of the important recitations, and was also heard with effect in 'King Robert of Sicily,' with Mr. John E. West's music. The other soloists were Mr. W. G. Stokes and Mr. Humphrey Bishop.

NORTHAMPTON.—The Musical Society, under the direction of their enterprising conductor, Mr. C. J. King, gave an excellent performance of Elgar's 'The Dream of Gerontius' on December 15. The choral singers tackled the difficulties of such sections as the Demon choruses with great confidence and precision, and at other times did justice to the devotional meaning of the work. The part of Gerontius was interpreted in his well-known manner by Mr. Gervase Elwes. The other soloists were Miss Edith Miller and Mr. Pedro de Zulueta. Boys from the London College of Choristers sang in the semi-chorus.

OSSETT (WEST RIDING).—The Choral Society opened its season, on November 22, with Stanford's 'The Revenge' and Hubert Bath's 'The wedding of Shon Maclean,' both of which they performed with excellent expression and choral effect. The soloists were Miss Lillie Wormald and Mr. Robert Burnett. Mr. Ben Whitworth conducted.

PAIGNTON.—At a concert given by the Paignton Choral Society on December 14, Brahms's 'Song of Destiny' and Mendelssohn's 'Loreley' were the chief features of the programme. The choir sang both works with due regard for their different characteristics as regards expression, and with commendable technique. The orchestra played Mozart's Symphony in E flat (K. 540), and solos were given by Miss Margaret Layton (vocalist), Miss Ruby Pike (violinist) and Mr. C. E. Pike (violinist). Mr. Wilfred Layton conducted.

PERTH (WESTERN AUSTRALIA).—The Philharmonic Society gave its second concert in His Majesty's Theatre on September 28, and achieved another distinct success. The work performed was Haydn's 'The Creation,' which had not been given in Perth for some ten years. The choruses were sung with great enthusiasm, and with a precision that gave evidence of very careful training. The most effective readings given were 'The heavens are telling,' 'Achieved is the glorious work' and 'Sing the Lord ye voices all.'

The soloists were Miss Minnie Waugh (soprano), Mr. Rhys Francis (tenor), and Mr. G. C. Haywood (bass). The orchestra, which had been carefully selected, did its work meritoriously, assisted by Miss Estelle Baird (pianoforte), and Mr. H. Hadwen-Chandler (organ). A large and brilliant audience was present, and was most encouraging in its appreciation of the work of the Society and its popular conductor, Mr. Herbert C. Goff. 'The Messiah' was chosen for performance at the Society's Christmas concert.

PLASMARL (SWANSEA).—Handel's 'Judas Maccabaeus' was performed at Hermon Chapel on December 8 by the chapel choir, conducted by the veteran Mr. John Jones, and assisted by Mr. Willy Roberts's orchestra. Both choir and band acquitted themselves well. They were assisted also by the following artists: Miss Gertrude Reynolds, Miss M. L. Williams, Mr. Tom Bonnell and Mr. David Hughes.

REIGATE.—The Choral Society opened its season on December 8 with a successful performance of Sullivan's 'The Golden Legend' at the Public Hall. The choral singing showed the high qualities of expression and technical efficiency for which the conductor, Mr. Harold Macpherson, is responsible. The principals were Miss Gertrude Walton, Miss Muriel Mitchell, Mr. Samuel Masters, and Mr. Robin Overleigh.

REPTON.—The Repton School Musical Society gave their 138th concert—a 'Village concert'—on December 7. The chief feature of the programme was a selection from 'The Messiah,' in which the choruses were sung by a choir of men and boys, and the solo portions by Master Franklin and Mr. George Bryant (an old Reptonian). Cowen's ballad 'John Gilpin' was also performed. Mr. T. Price conducted.

RIPON.—An excellent performance of Schumann's rarely-heard 'Requiem' was given in the choir of the cathedral on Sunday afternoon, December 4, under the conductorship of Mr. C. H. Moody. Mr. W. E. Cave, pupil-assistant to Mr. Moody, played the organ accompaniments most artistically. The choir was filled to overflowing, and some hundreds were compelled to find seats in the nave.—The first concert of the Ripon Choral Society's twenty-sixth season took place on December 13 at the Victoria Opera House. The performance of Dvorák's 'Spectre's bride' was one of the best in the history of the Society. The choir sang superbly throughout, and the orchestral part was played with commendable finish by the Leeds Municipal Orchestra. Miss Maude Wilby and Mr. Frank Mullings gave remarkably fine interpretations of solos and duets. The hon. conductor, Mr. C. H. Moody, sang the baritone music at short notice. A miscellaneous second part included Sibelius's 'Valse triste' and Gluck's 'Don Juan' ballet suite.

RUGBY.—At the concert given by the Philharmonic Society on November 17, a Wagner programme was carried out under the direction of Mr. Basil Johnson. The choir took part in excerpts from 'Parsifal,' 'The Flying Dutchman,' and 'Die Meistersinger,' and did their work efficiently. Mr. Harold Wilde sang the Preislied, which led into the choral finale from the last-mentioned work. The other soloists were Miss Margaret Layton, Mr. Jackson Potter and Mr. Charles Tree. On December 8 the same Society performed the 'Messiah,' which had not been heard in Rugby for several years. The feature of the solo music was the singing of Mr. Dan Price, whose efforts were well seconded by those of Miss Mary Fielding, Miss R. Clayton and Mr. Joseph Reed.

RYDE, I.W.—Beethoven's 'Hallelujah' and Schubert's 'Song of Miriam,' &c., were sung by the oratorio choir in St. John's church on December 1. The accompaniments were played by an orchestra, assisted by Miss Marguerite Watts at the organ, Mrs. G. W. Fellows, soprano soloist, and Mr. W. Brennand Smith, organist of the church, conducted.

ST. ALBANS.—The choral society and orchestra of the School of Music performed Mr. Coleridge-Taylor's 'The Death of Minnehaha' on December 13, under the direction of Mr. W. L. Luttman, principal of the School. The choral singing was, in the opinion of a local commentator, some of the best that has been heard in the city, and came as a revelation to many of the audience. Miss Viola Salvin and Mr. T. W. Holgate were the soloists. An efficient orchestra played the accompaniments, and contributed separately a Symphony by Haydn.

ST. LEONARDS.—On December 7, at the Church of St. John the Evangelist, the Choir and Musical Society sang Brahms's 'Requiem' for the fourth time. An impressive performance was conducted by the organist and choirmaster, Mr. Leonard O'Connor, to whom special praise is due for his untiring work in giving this great composition a worthy interpretation year by year. Miss Jenkins and Mr. Crouch were the soloists.

SCARBOROUGH.—The Philharmonic Society opened its concert on December 7 with a performance of Coleridge-Taylor's 'Bon-Bon Choral Suite,' a work which was new to Scarborough. The choir, which is admirably trained by Dr. Ely, was not slow to take advantage of the many opportunities afforded them in the work for artistic and cultured singing, the ladies especially distinguishing themselves in the fourth number, 'Love and Hymen.' The baritone soloist was Mr. George Uttley, who also sang Stanford's new 'Songs of the Fleet' extremely well. Mr. Johan Rasch played Max Bruch's G minor Concerto, and the orchestra played the first movement of the 'Eroica' Symphony. Room was also found on the programme for Dr. Charles Wood's striking 'Dirge for two veterans,' in which Mr. Uttley and the choir again distinguished themselves.

SEVENOAKS.—The Sevenoaks Choral and Orchestral Society's twenty-second concert was given in the Club Hall on December 6. An interesting programme was presented, which included Brahms's 'Song of Destiny,' Mendelssohn's 95th Psalm, and Beethoven's first Symphony. The orchestra of local players was assisted by several members of the New Symphony Orchestra. The choral singing earned universal admiration. The soloists were Miss Ena Meyer, Miss Vera Moore, and Mr. Herbert Grover. The conductor was Mr. W. A. Taylor.

SOUTHAMPTON.—An excellent performance of Haydn's 'The Creation' was given by the Philharmonic Society at the Hartley Hall on November 23, under the able and well-inspired direction of Mr. E. H. Moberley. The choruses were intelligently and expressively sung by the choir, whose efforts often reached the high standard of the solo singing contributed by Miss Agnes Coates, Mr. Frank Mullings and Mr. James Coleman.

SOUTHPORT.—The Choral Society, ably conducted by Mr. J. C. Clarke, gave a fine performance of 'Elijah,' on December 9, before an excellent attendance. The principals were Madame Sadler-Fogg, Miss Hilda Cragg-James, Mr. John Collett, and Mr. Bridge Peters. The choral singing of this Society is quite noted, and on this occasion they gave a notable interpretation of the work. The orchestra, though small, was satisfactory.

STAFFORD.—On December 6 last, the Stafford Choral Union gave a very fine performance of Hubert Bath's cantata 'The wedding of Shon Maclean,' under the conductorship of Mr. Herbert Drury. Miss Mabel Perry and Mr. Arthur Rawstorn were the soloists, and the orchestra played under the leadership of Herr H. Suck, of Birmingham. As a second part of the concert, Mr. Frederick Dawson gave a pianoforte recital, to the great delight of the large audience.

SWANSEA.—The Swansea Church Choral Society, conducted by Mr. T. D. Jones, gave a successful and highly creditable performance of Sterndale Bennett's 'The Woman of Samaria' on December 1, at St. Mary's Church. The soloists were Madame Powney, Miss Kate Easton, Mr. T. H. Spicer and Mr. J. Thomas.

SWINDON.—A concert, organized by Madame Dockray, took place at the G.W.K. Mechanics' Institution on November 21. The chief feature of the programme was Madame Liza Lehmann's song-cycle 'In a Persian garden,' sung by Madame Dockray, Miss Wilhelmie Fink, Mr. Wilfred Hudson and Mr. J. Donning.

TENBURY.—Schumann's 'Paradise and the Peri,' and 'Winter,' from Haydn's 'Seasons,' were performed by the Musical Society for the first time on November 23. The choral singing was throughout deserving of the highest praise for its expression and conscientiousness. The tone was full and rich where necessary, and the pianissimo singing in 'O blessed tears' was remarkable. The soloists were Madame Hilda Sands, Miss Mabel Cross and Mr. H. E. Cripp. Mr. J. P. Davis conducted.

TITCHFIELD.—On Wednesday, December 14, the Titchfield and District Choral Society gave their fifth annual concert. Sterndale Bennett's 'May Queen' and Van Bree's 'St. Cecilia's Day' were admirably rendered by the choir and soloists. The latter were Miss Elsy Cockings (soprano), Mr. Ivor Warren (tenor), and Mr. Charles Wassell (bass). The male chorus, 'Rise, and break the chains,' was sung with much spirit. The whole choir is deserving of praise for its precision, excellence of tone, and ready response to the beat of the conductor, Mr. M. G. Coulson.

TORONTO.—The annual concert of the Toronto College of Music was given in the Massey Hall on November 2, under the direction of Dr. F. H. Torrington. The programme consisted of vocal and instrumental solo performances given by ten pupils of the College, with orchestral accompaniment, and Bach's Concerto in D minor for three pianofortes. The high standard of ability shown by all who took part reflected great credit on the organizers and the staff of the College.

WINDSOR.—The annual concert of the choir of St. George's Chapel and the Private Chapel took place on November 21. In the absence of Sir Walter Parratt the conductor's chair was occupied by Mr. Martin Akerman. The chief choral numbers were Spofforth's 'Come, bounteous May' and Wesley's 'I wish to tune my quiv'ring lyre,' both for male voices, Sir Walter Parratt's 'The quiet village,' and Dr. C. H. Lloyd's 'Kitty of Coleraine,' which was conducted by the composer. Solos were given by Miss Gertrude Walton (soprano) and Mr. Edward Mason (violinello).

WORCESTER.—The Musical Society gave a creditable performance of the 'The Messiah' on December 13, under the direction of Mr. W. Mann Dyson. The choir was well balanced and sang with enthusiasm. The solo parts were undertaken by Miss May Roberts, Miss Lilian Holloway, Mr. F. G. Pardoe and Mr. William Batey. Mr. A. P. Barry assisted at the organ.

Answers to Correspondents.

F. A. FACER.—Our idea of the metronome rates of the two Brahms Folk-Songs (Musical Times, 787) is as follows: 'In silent night,' ♩ = M. 72; 'Love, fare thee well,' ♩ = M. 50 (that is, beating twice in a bar). The refrain (last four bars) should be sung in strict time. We have heard it miserably drawn out. The 'a' in 'You for your love would die, a' (from 'You stole my love') should be pronounced aa, not ai.

G. F. B.—(1) The second subject of the first movement of Beethoven's Sonata, Op. 79 begins at the 24th bar. (2) Valves were first applied to horns about 1813, but did not come into general use till much later. (3) The vast majority of present-day composers write exclusively for the F horn.

ST. CECILIA.—The approximate metronome rates for Rachmaninoff's Prelude in C sharp minor are as follows: After Lento (third bar), Andante ♩ = 88, Agitato ♩ = 138. These are the rates round which the inevitable rubato should revolve, but we should be sorry to say that there is only one proper rate for each section.

A SINGER.—Pipe-smoking is generally considered a risk by singers. Its physical effects may possibly be neutralised by the tranquil resignation with the scheme of things it induces.

R. A. H. C. U.—Your Kyries have many defects, and we are sorry to add, no commercial value.

Other answers are held over, or have been given privately.

ITS VALUE TO THE TEACHER.

In "The Musical Educator" every section is dealt with by an expert. Its value to the teacher of music is obvious, because it shows the way—at once simple and lucid—in which some of the greatest of musical professors would set about the instruction of a pupil anxious to perfect himself in his particular department, whether it be that of the piano, the violin, the harp, or any other instrument, or of any department of singing.

Add to this its all-round value as a standard work of reference on every point concerning the wide domain of music and musicians, and it will be granted that "The Musical Educator" is unique as well as complete.

TWO OPINIONS.

Sir J. FREDERICK BRIDGE.

"The Musical Educator" is full of useful information plainly set forth. The musical illustrations are excellent."

Dr. CRISER, Mus.D. Oxon, F.R.C.O., F.T.C.L.

(Examiner in Music at Trinity College), writes:—

"We have here an illuminative work of great value, not only to the student, but also to the general reader. . . . It contains excellent instructions."

WILSON MANHIRE

NEW WORKS FOR 1911.

PIANOFORTE SCALE CHART OF DOUBLE THIRDS

For the Metropolitan Examinations of L.R.A.M.,
 A.R.C.M., L.T.C.L., L.G.S.M., L.I.S.M.

PRICE (EITHER FINGERING), ONE SHILLING AND SIXPENCE NET.

The ordinary Scale Book of Double thirds is bewildering in its detail of changing-fingering; it itself an obstacle to the few pupils overcome. Mr. MANHIRE has ingeniously contrived a SYSTEM OF BRACKETING THE HAND-POSITIONS IN EACH SCALE, with the result that the sequence of hand-changes is set clearly before the pupil. In addition to this the author has TABULATED THE SYSTEM (in his preface)—WITH FINGERING ONLY—so that IT IS POSSIBLE TO LEARN MENTALLY THE FINGERING SEQUENCES OF EACH SCALE BEFORE USING THE KEYBOARD. . . . This original idea alone would entitle the work to popularity, since it simplifies the process of learning the scales, and removes at once an apparently complicated problem.

SCALE CHART

For the Preparatory Pianoforte Examination of TRINITY COLLEGE, London, with Examination Tests.

PRICE SIXPENCE NET.

THE ASSOCIATED BOARD CANDIDATE'S

SCALE AND AREGGIO CHART

for the Primary and Elementary Grades in PIANOFORTE PLAYING, with Examination Tests.

PRICE SIXPENCE NET.

The Scales and Arpeggi contained in these Charts are EXACTLY as required by the Examiners for the respective Examinations named therein, and only those Scales and Arpeggi stated in the Syllabus and Requirements are included.

For want of Charts of this kind many pupils use an ordinary Scale and Arpeggio Manual, and so the unnecessary trouble of selecting particular Scales and Arpeggi needed for the Examinations, frequently find that these ARE NOT WRITTEN AS REQUIRED BY THE EXAMINERS FOR JUNIOR CANDIDATES.

These Charts may be regarded as supplementary to "The Beginner's Scale and Arpeggio Manual" by the same Author, and may be had with EITHER FINGERING.

THE MUSIC STUDENT'S COPY-BOOK

PRICE ONE SHILLING NET.

The author has given EXAMPLES OF EVERY DETAIL in musical notation, such as notes, clefs, time-signatures, rests, accidentals, abbreviations, short score, ornaments, part writing, &c., and has explained on each page the correct position, &c., of attendant details. Blank staves are left beneath the text so that the student can reproduce these examples, there being ample space for much duplication.

The Copy-Book is issued in conjunction with Mr. Wilson Manhire's "First Principles of Music"; but it stands also as a separate and complete work, and is unquestionably one of the most useful educational publications of recent times.

FIRST PRINCIPLES OF MUSIC

The Candidate's Manual for all Examinations.

PRICE ONE SHILLING NET.

This book is an EPIHOME OF THE ELEMENTS OF MUSIC, and supplies in simple and direct language the musical knowledge essential to young students. The Author has arranged his information so that it is a DIRECT GUIDE TO EXAMINATION WORK. Students often find it difficult to convey in writing the answers to ordinary musical questions, and are frequently unfamiliar with the METHODS OF EXAMINING musical notation; as a wise and experienced monitor, Mr. Wilson Manhire's method of conveying musical knowledge will be an excellent guide.

HINTS TO VIOLINISTS

on Examination Preparation for the Associated Board and other Examinations.

PRICE ONE SHILLING NET.

This latest book is planned in the author's customary way and covers all details, FROM THE STUDENT'S FIRST STUDIES AT HOME TO HIS PERFORMANCE IN THE EXAMINATION ROOM. The usual stage-fright and misconception of how Tests are to be performed accounts for a deal of failure—and knowing this the author has paved the way for the Student so that no element of chance can cheat the Candidate of success.

"Gounod's 'Redemption' appeals to the public largely on account of the words with which the music is associated, and the same can certainly be said of 'The Messiah.' In each case the music, however, is undoubtedly a powerful factor, and the words being not only impressive, but also familiar, the listener is doubly affected. . . . Then, to speak only of Gounod's work, it is strong because it is sincere. A gifted composer, by thoughtful and deep study of the sacred story, can illustrate it in tones effectively, but more convincingly if in true sympathy with the subject—in other words, if he be religious, using that term in its widest sense. And Gounod, like Bach, and in modern times Liszt, was of a serious cast of mind, and possessor, moreover, of a strongly emotional nature."—Daily Telegraph, March 1, 1909.

"If allowances are made for the state of popular musical thought in his day, and for the undoubted sincerity with which Gounod adopted a style that suited his nature, it is possible to consider his 'Redemption' in many respects a work of high art. Melody in itself, if dissociated from unsuitable surroundings, will never fail to appeal, and broad choral effect, when secured by skilful methods, will always give pleasure. The audience that gathered on Saturday evening to hear the 'Redemption' performed by the Alexandra Palace Choral Society, under the direction of Mr. Allen Gill, showed by their number and their interested attention that the work still retains its hold."—Morning Post, March 1, 1909.

PASSION SERVICE

FOR THE SEASON OF

LENT AND GOOD FRIDAY.

"Scholarly writing, combined with unmistakable talent, and eminently adapted to the purpose for which it was written and composed. The work will probably be largely used, and Mr. Gaul has to be congratulated upon another success."—Sheffield Independent.

"The course of sacred events connected with the Passion is laid out by the writer so as to form a series of six distinct 'scenes.' The subjects of these divisions, each occupied with a particular stage of the Mystery, are respectively: 'The Traitor at the Table,' 'The Denial,' 'The Condemnation before Pilate,' 'The Mockery on Calvary,' 'The Shadow of Death,' and 'The Holy Sepulchre.' The style of the composition resembles generally that of Mr. Gaul's previous writings—the same effective, grateful part-writing, and the same expressive and melodious treatment of the solo voice. In those sections, notably that of the Unjust Condemnation, where the realistic element is predominant, the composer has manifested his ability to write with dramatic force and intensity as well as with lyric charm. In this respect the choral writing distinguished itself in comparison with that in the 'Holy City' and other of the composer's works. Mr. Gaul has not written new hymn tunes for the author's lyrics; the tunes selected are from among those in ordinary congregational use. Altogether considered, Mr. Gaul's new work will, undoubtedly, greatly enhance his already high reputation in the line of sacred composition."—Musical Standard.

Words only, 7s. 6d. per 100.

The loan of Parts for a limited Orchestra—namely, Strings, 2 Flutes, 2 Clarinets, 2 Cornets, Bass Trombone or Euphonium, and Kettledrums, may be had on application to the Composer, Gillott Lodge, Edgbaston.

MUSIC BY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

"Few Cantatas are as rich in chaste melodies, charming choruses, and exquisite orchestration as Alfred R. Gaul's 'Joan of Arc,' performed for the first time in Plymouth by the Vocal Association in the Guildhall."

—The Western News.

"Must enhance the high reputation of its composer."—Liverpool Courier.

"The inspiration of a highly-refined musician. . . . The Cantata is even a more masterly and beautiful work than 'The Holy City.'"

—Huddersfield Examiner.

"No more charming Cantata than 'Joan of Arc' could have been chosen. It abounds in delicious music. There is not a tedious note in it."—Newcastle-on-Tyne Daily Chronicle.

"Gives the listener a vivid and realistic impression, its attractiveness being continuous instead of spasmodic."—Bradford Observer.

"The Exeter Oratorio Society last night achieved a brilliant success, and it may safely be said, without fear of exaggeration, that never before have they performed a work more satisfactory to themselves or more interesting to the audience than 'Joan of Arc.'"—Western Times.

"One of the most delightful Concerts ever given by the South Shields Choral Society was that of last evening, when the principal piece was 'Joan of Arc.' We cannot speak too highly of Mr. Gaul's work, which is of the most interesting description."—The Shields Daily News.

THE TIMES.

The only other work which requires special mention is Dr. Brewer's charming Suite of five Old English songs for chorus and orchestra; . . . all five are full of lightness and grace, delicate little pieces of vocal writing set off with piquant orchestration.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

Dr. Brewer's Suite was brought to its first hearing, and mightily pleased the majority of the audience. . . . It is a breezy little composition, well laid out for not too ambitious choral societies, its music is always in perfectly good taste, now and then it is full of a genuine and very dainty grace, as in the pretty chorus for mixed voices, "Love is a sickness full of woes," and the delicious sixteenth century lullaby, "Golden slumbers kiss your eyes," which is written for female voices only, and always it is clean and wholesome, and unexacting in its demands upon the singers. Clearly, then, it justifies its existence. The Suite went very well, under Dr. Brewer's guidance, the composer at the close being repeatedly recalled.

MORNING POST.

The numbers are singularly happy compositions, highly charged with old-world grace, but devised with a full knowledge of modern requirements, and their popularity is likely to be great, if their reception may be taken as any augury.

STANDARD.

The same fancy and imagination which characterise the composer's pastoral songs play round this delightful series of vignettes of Merrie England. The music, with its breezy lightness and delicate orchestral texture, suggests the playtime of Corydon and Phyllis amid the bowers of Arcady. Of the five numbers, the most striking are "Barley-Break," written in the style of the Elizabethan madrigalists, for male voices; and "Golden Slumbers," for female voices, a charming and seductive lullaby, daintily scored and very effective with its muted strings accompaniment and its melody and rhythmic sense. The last number, "Summer Sports," from which the Suite takes its name, is the most elaborate. The score graphically describes the hunt, and the bustle and excitement of the chase are cleverly suggested in the rush and life of the music. The whole work, which was finely performed and enthusiastically received, forms a little gallery of pastoral pictures of the olden time, and admirably reflects the sentiment of the sixteenth century poets, the spirit of whose verses Dr. Brewer has so happily caught.

YORKSHIRE POST.

It is eminently tuneful, daintily orchestrated, and as thoroughly English as the words. The Suite was sung by the Gloucester contingent of the chorus with admirable spirit, and had a very pleasant and exhilarating effect. There is a distinct place for such music, which, without attempting to scale ambitious heights, is artistic and agreeable, and there is no doubt that "Summer Sports" will have a good vogue with choral societies, as indeed it well deserves.

BRISTOL TIMES.

The composition is the best of the kind Dr. Brewer has written. His music is always bright, melodious, straight-forward, clear in design, and captivating. In this example these features are forthcoming in their best degree, and the musical equipment of every poem hits off in the most apt and enchanting manner the sentiments. Directed by the author, the choir and band gave a fine illustration of the work. They grasped the spirit of the poems and music, entered with zest into their portrayal, and helped to make "Summer Sports" a triumphant success.

MANCHESTER COURIER.

Grace, refinement, and charm are the characteristics of "Summer Sports," and as the little work cannot unduly tax the powers of any moderately proficient choir, we prophesy for it an immediate and wide popularity.

FREDERIC H. COWEN.

PRICE THREE SHILLINGS.

Paper Boards, 3s. 6d.; Cloth, gilt, 5s.; Vocal Parts, 1s. 6d. each; String Parts, 12s. 6d.; Wind Parts and Full Score, MS.

THE TIMES.

It was quite clear that the work made a deep impression upon the audience; for the applause during its course and at the end was evidently the result of real appreciation, and not merely what was due to the popular conductor of the festival. The appreciation was well deserved; there are points of genuine beauty in every number, and the earnestness of the whole conception and the skill with which it has been carried out place the composer in a stronger light than anything which he has yet written.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

It is a genuine pleasure to record that the very large audience was filled with an enthusiasm that knew no bounds. Recall of the composer followed recall in the charming concert-room. . . . Dr. Cowen has risen to heights at least as lofty as those reached by the poet whose muse attracted him. . . . I would go further, and say that he has risen higher. . . . Dr. Cowen, true to himself, has surpassed himself, and many are the lovely passages in his most recent production.

STANDARD.

Dr. Cowen's festival novelty, "The Veil," which was heard for the first time, is the most ambitious and notable composition the composer has made to the literature of music. . . . Early in the first part we catch a glimpse of his felicity of expression in the tenor solo, "Now an Evangel," which in its sense of compassion makes an immediate appeal. . . . "Earth the mother," with its somewhat Elgareque influence and feeling, is one of the most eloquent sections. The second part, "The Dream of the World without Death," is ushered in by some pregnant orchestral strains, and it is this section that went a long way to-night to establish the success of the work. The contralto solo, with its note of tender solitude, mingled with passionate questionings, comes nearer to genuine inspiration than any other portion of the scena. . . . The duet between the Soul and the Body is probably the one that will go furthest in establishing the popularity of the work. . . . The work met with a great reception, and deservedly so, for it is, in depth of feeling, in width of design, and in imagination, the greatest and best thing that Dr. Cowen has given us.

MORNING LEADER.

Its sincerity was clear, and its success was undeniable. . . . It proved to be essentially modern in conception, and its qualities in this respect were heightened by the absence of any traces of foreign, as distinct from British influence. It belongs to the same school as the "Dream of Gerontius," and it can claim a high place among the recent output of choral work of a distinctively national type. The interest of the work occasionally rose to great heights. . . . The general idea of mankind intently seeking to penetrate the mysteries of the unknown was excellently conveyed, and a still better effect was obtained in those sections where intense and tragical expression was called for. Altogether it was clear that in this music the composer has made a notable addition to choral literature, and has shown himself ready to adopt the British style of abstract expression.

DAILY NEWS.

There are several happy imaginative touches. . . . Among these the most noticeable was the contralto's song, in which a mother bewails the loss of her children, which is a beautiful and impressive composition. Again, Dr. Cowen has been inspired in the song of the Watcher at the deathbed. It is for baritone, and has real poignancy and beauty. One could continue to point out this and that beauty in the work, but the mere mention of solos will convey nothing to the reader who has not heard and does not know "The Veil." It must be enough to say that Dr. Cowen has written a work which contains many surprising beauties, and that, if it falls short of being a masterpiece, it is certainly a most interesting contribution to native art.

MORNING POST.

The success with which he presents his thoughts is a tribute to his intellectual powers, and helps to make the work a remarkable production. . . . There is a highly successful effort in the creation of atmosphere at the commencement of the "Dream of the World without Death," with the scene of the Watcher, and the orchestral colouring is excellent. . . . The sequential description by the Mother of the loss of her two children possesses great pathos, and the chorus that concludes this section has a breadth and an originality that might well have been maintained. . . . The duet [between the Soul and the Body] has a lyrical character that fully represents Dr. Cowen's powers of writing graceful and pleasing music. . . . The best effect is secured at its close, in which the Chorus have a share, and here the construction and colouring are masterly in their grace and tenderness. The Song of the Seeker does not in itself indicate that the special manner has been maintained, and the impression made was by means of the choral appeal for the removal of the Veil. It is here that the work reaches its climax, and with so much conviction that the audience burst into spontaneous applause when it reached a point of apparent termination. . . . The Vision of the Divine Presence is described in hushed, spoken sentences, and the work comes to a calm end with the awakening of the Seeker and the close of the vision.

YORKSHIRE POST.

"The Veil" strikes one first of all as a remarkably able and thoughtful treatment of a noble and inspiring theme, and it shows not merely the power to provide fitting music for the text, but a sense of proportion and of the value of contrast that is of the greatest possible service in enhancing and holding the hearer's attention. The weird chromatic progressions by which it is sought to express the mystical atmosphere of a great portion of the poem are relieved by the tender mood of the section entitled "Earth the mother," and again by the simple and appealing pathos of the episode in which the mother is bereft of her children. This had the advantage of being sung by Madame Kirkby Lunn, whose consummate art has never been more strikingly displayed, for she obtained an effect of the deepest emotion without the least suspicion of exaggeration, but with a reticence which enhanced the sincerity of the performance not easily forgotten by those who heard it. But only her rightful share must be allowed the executant for a result which she could not have produced had not the same sincerity been discoverable in the music, which, to my mind, places Dr. Cowen on a still higher plane than he has ever occupied hitherto. Another very beautiful scene is the duet for soprano and tenor, a love scene of an exalted type, breathing an emotion which is not merely sensuous, yet has a note of passion mingled with its strains. A happy idea is where the lifting of the Veil is told by the contraltos and basses with the spoken voice, the effect of which at the central point of a great musical work is most striking.

MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.

His music is essentially vivid. Much use is made of leading themes, and that which is associated with the idea of the Veil is especially striking. . . . The dream scene, in which the mother bewails, not the death, but the sudden disappearance of her children, is astonishingly powerful, and with the part of the mother filled by Madame Kirkby Lunn, it provided the point of supreme interest in the whole cantata. . . . The most cumulative effect occurs towards the end of the work. It is very massive and imposing. . . . The work was greeted with well-judged enthusiasm, and Dr. Cowen was called upon several times to acknowledge the applause.

BIRMINGHAM DAILY POST.

When all deductions have been made there remains a quantity of very impressive and touching music, and music with a good deal of genuine humanity in it. It was received with great enthusiasm.

THE VICAR OF BRAY VARIATIONS FOR STRING ORCHESTRA

COMPOSED BY

ERNEST AUSTIN.

(Op. 35.)

STRING PARTS, 6s.; PIANOFORTE SOLO, 2s. 6d.
FULL SCORE (in the Press).

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

Mr. Austin shows ready employment of orchestral means, and his nine Variations are well wrought and effective. Very expressive is the third, a slow movement in two sections, and its successor, a crisp and lively Scherzo, engages the ear in thoroughly legitimate fashion. . . . A spirited close is provided to a decidedly meritorious and resourceful work, which so took the fancy of the audience that they twice summoned Mr. Austin to the platform and warmly applauded him.

MORNING POST.

The Variations, performed for the first time; created an immediate impression. . . . They indeed make high claims to be regarded as a classic. They are certain to be popular because, with all their skill, ingenuity, and inventiveness, their construction is clear and their original basis is never hidden.

STANDARD.

In all the Variations there is woven a web of harmony both fanciful and artistic. Such is the contrapuntal skill employed in his treatment of the theme that it is only to be regretted that the composer did not make a little more use of it. Mr. Wood secured an excellent reading, and at the close Mr. Austin was called to the platform.

DAILY NEWS.

Quite the most interesting, and individual work was Mr. Ernest Austin's set of Variations for strings on the tune of "The Vicar of Bray."

DAILY MAIL.

It is an immensely clever composition and should be placed permanently in the repertory of the Queen's Hall Orchestra.

REFEREE.

Splendidly played, the merry work was most heartily received.

SUNDAY TIMES.

Nine in number, they show great ingenuity in preserving the characteristics of the subject theme through its rhythmic and harmonic transformations, and the music has a spontaneous and thoroughly English feeling. One of the best sections is that in march time, in the Trio of which fragments of the subject theme are heard against a drone accompaniment; while in the last section the composer has given play to a merry wit and has pictured the four instruments in strenuous competition for priority of audience. So clear was its humour that it was followed with ripples of laughter from the audience, and the call to the composer was unusually enthusiastic.

MUSICAL STANDARD.

A work of such absolute delightfulness is not heard everyday. From start to finish one's interest was held captive as the composer commented variously upon his theme. In the spirit of true beauty were Variations once those and right, while energy dominated others; and a vein of delicious humour accounted for the rest. The writing is always clear and sane, with any amount of sheer cleverness. The finale is an absolute reiteration of humour, and is worked out with irresistible comedy.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

From the opening Allegretto scherzando—a particularly fresh and blithesome section—to the concluding Gavotte and Musette, the music runs a simple, melodious course. . . . The work is conceived throughout in a joyous mood, but the composer, by his deft use of rhythms, never allows the hearer to experience any sense of sameness.

STANDARD.

On many occasions Mr. Percy Pitt has proved his versatile musical gifts, but rarely have they been indicated in a more attractive way and with such a pleasant vein of fancy as in his "Serenade." . . . These five sketches are like little water-colours in their lightness of design and delicacy of hue, and appeal to the imagination because of their unpretentious, simple, yet interesting character.

DAILY GRAPHIC.

The "Serenade" scored one of the most brilliant successes of the season. It has everything in its favour—melody, piquant orchestration, and clever musicianship.

DAILY MAIL.

It is a work which should be immensely popular.

DAILY NEWS.

The Suite as a whole made very pleasant hearing, and should prove popular with conductors of small orchestras.

SUNDAY TIMES.

Its melodiousness, clearness, and deft orchestration make it delightful hearing.

THE TIMES.

It may at once be said that the work is a masterpiece; serene, logical, sincere, and most original, it shows an assured mastery in the handling of resources. . . . The whole of the first movement is interesting in no ordinary degree, and while the writing for the soloist is of astounding difficulty, the part never stands out as the only thing to arrest attention; the fabric of the whole is closely woven, and not only is the orchestral colouring gorgeous, but the design is rich and nobly felt. . . . The slow movement is based on a simple, ballad-like theme, to which the solo violin generally plays an elaborate accompaniment in counterpoint; the whole section has a deliciously fresh effect, and while intensely emotional, is never cloying in its beauty. . . . If the Finale has portions that at a first hearing seem a little abrupt and lacking in point, the use made of the brilliant solo passages is always masterly, and the strenuous character of the movement is quite appropriate after what has preceded it. The great moment of the section, and of the whole Concerto, is a very remarkable Cadenza accompagnata, in which the various themes are passed in review in a kind of rhapsody for the solo instrument. . . . The end of the work is worthy of the dignity of the piece, which, after making due allowance for the excitement of such a first performance as that of last night, must surely rank among the great concertos of the world.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

On a first hearing several things must strike any listener, namely, the splendid simplicity of the music as music; its intense humanness and emotional content; the sheer, haunting beauty of most of the thematic material and its strong individuality. . . . Further, as a complete expression, a complete revelation, of a composer's self it is unquestionably Elgar's masterpiece. . . . We have no hesitation in saying that his new Concerto, while it yields place to none existing in point of beauty, is far ahead of all in the matter of solo technique. . . . Small wonder that the production was a triumph—a triumph for art in general, not merely in the parochial meaning of the term or purely personal. . . . In the matter of sincere humanness in expression and emotional feeling, of sheer beauty of sound, whether in the orchestra or on the solo violin, of fancy and character in the theme, or of mastery of his means, Elgar here has undoubtedly surpassed any previous composition of his own. Of that there can be no question. He has done more: he has, as was said, added a new work to genuine musical literature.

STANDARD.

Melodically it is by turns chaste and sensuous and emotional in feeling. . . . The nobility of sentiment is as marked as ever, and it is in such moments that the composer bursts the shackles that hold him back, and enters into a kingdom that is all his own. . . . In the very first bar the identity of the composer stands revealed. . . . A simple cantabile-like melody ushers in the second movement—the solo part enters with a counter theme—but here again it is the more ennobled strains that hold the senses captive. The Finale contains a wealth of brilliant, swirling, and intricate music for the chief instrument.

MORNING POST.

It is not on its technical side, attractive and distinctive though it be, that the remarkable character of the Concerto is to be found. It is in the poetry of the themes, the wonderful detail of their treatment, and the extraordinary colour of the orchestral scoring. The themes—and there are many employed, since the composer's imagination brooks no restraint—are distinguished by their beauty. . . . Their contour has the calm dignity of the loftiest conception; there is no aiming at a popular appeal, yet the closest attention is secured from the outset by their noble beauty. . . . For its authority, its humanity, and its marvellous constructive detail the Concerto, therefore, stands as the greatest work yet produced by a British composer.

MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.

The lofty thoughtfulness of the opening tutti and its concise way of stating the impressive themes at once prepare the hearer for a work of importance. The ravishing beauty of the second melody—which is noticeable keeps its physiognomy unchanged throughout,—the dramatic first entrance of the soloist, and the extraordinary power and beauty of the close of the movement are things which will strike the most casual hearer. . . . There will be little dispute as to the serene if slightly feminine beauty of the slow movement or as to its lofty idealism. It suggests "Parsifal"—but it is genuine Elgar. Indeed, it will not be surprising if it comes to be considered the most beautiful thing Elgar has written. The vigour of the Finale is irresistible. . . . It contains the most powerful and original section of the whole, a Cadenza accompanied in the most original way. It is remarkable as a résumé of all that has gone before, and is really a miniature movement of great significance.

YORKSHIRE POST.

At a first hearing the Concerto impresses itself on the listener's mind as being artistic in the highest sense of the term. This is suggested at the very opening by the unpretentious but resonant presentation of the first subject. . . . The general sentiment of the music is nobility and quiet happiness, with a touch now and again of yearning tenderness. . . . The Andante, will probably be termed the gem of the composition. It is chiefly based upon a song-like theme of amorous tenderness, and has a companion subject, but both are characterized by a simplicity and refined expressiveness which make a strong appeal to the imagination of the listener. The Finale is the most vigorous portion of the work. At the beginning the solo violin is much more prominent than it has been hitherto, being written for with great brilliancy, but the orchestra soon reasserts itself, and the movement is continued with immense animation until a pianissimo passage of mystic impressiveness intervenes. Soon after this, the soloist begins an elaborate Cadenza, which, however, seems a logical outcome of the preceding matter and the principal climax of the work.

A Modern School for the Violin

BY

AUGUST WILHELMJ AND JAMES BROWN.

THE purpose of this Work is to provide, in one systematic and comprehensive scheme, all that is necessary for the acquirement of the Art of Modern Violin Playing.

"A Modern School for the Violin" consists of Six Books devoted to Daily Technical Practice, Six Books of Studies for Violin alone, and a large number of Pieces with Pianoforte Accompaniment, the Violin parts being specially edited for the purposes of teaching.

SECTION A.—TECHNICAL PRACTICE. IN SIX BOOKS.

The foundation of "A Modern School for the Violin" is laid by means of a series of Six Books dealing exclusively with the important subject of DAILY TECHNICAL PRACTICE. The First Book of Technical Practice (Book 1A) is limited to the 1st Position; the Second Book (2A) to the 1st, 2nd, and 3rd Positions; the Third Book (3A) to the first five Positions; and so on. Bowings and other technical devices are introduced in a similarly progressive manner throughout. Each Book of Technical Practice is divided into "Lessons" (or Chapters), and each Lesson contains a number of short repeating Exercises on some definite point of Violin Technique—as Fingering, Bowing, &c., with the needful explanations. Included in each Book will be found a complete set of Scales and Arpeggi, arranged according to the particular stage of advancement reached.

Taken as a whole, this section is intended to facilitate, and to insist on, a thorough, steady, and continuous progress in the mastery of the Instrument, this being the only possible means of preparing the groundwork for artistic achievement with all its lasting delights.

SECTION B.—STUDIES. IN SIX BOOKS.

Section B is formed of a series of original and selected Studies, in Six Books. Each Book of Studies (Section B) is carefully co-ordinated, in respect of difficulty and range of subject, with the correspondingly numbered Book of Technical Practice (Section A). Thus the First Book of Studies (1B) is written in the 1st Position; the Second Book (2B) in the 1st, 2nd, and 3rd Positions; the 3rd Book (3B) in all Positions up to and including the 5th; and so on. It should further be explained that the two Sections are designed to complement one another, and that the "School" must be practised, not in single Books of Technical Practice and Studies alternately, but in pairs. Thus, Books 1A and 1B are to be taken concurrently, then Books 2A and 2B, 3A and 3B, and so on, and the appropriate pairs are now issued bound together in cloth (see Cloth Bindings below).

1A. TECHNICAL PRACTICE (1st Position)	2s. od.	1B. STUDIES ... (1st Position)	2s. od.

MEMORIAL TO MARY WAKEFIELD.

THE following circular is being sent out on behalf of the Committee of the Association of Musical Competition Festivals:—

To the deep regret of a large circle of friends, Miss Mary Wakefield died on September 16, 1910. One of the chief achievements of her useful and unselfish life was the development of the Musical Competition Festival movement, which now spreads its influence over the whole country.

It is, therefore, the desire of her friends to perpetuate her memory in connection with the movement. To this end, the committee of the Association of Musical Competition Festivals has decided to raise a fund to provide the design for a medallion or medal, copies of which will be given to each of the affiliated competition centres, to be by them awarded, either permanently, or for a year, as a challenge trophy, as the committee for each centre may decide. This will also be available, at cost price, for the non-affiliated competitions. The medal or medallion will bear upon it a portrait of Miss Wakefield.

It is hoped that many of her friends in all classes of the social scale, and others who have sympathised with her life-work, and witnessed its remarkable results, will subscribe.

Donations, even of small amounts, choir collections, &c., will be gladly received and should be sent, before February 11, 1911, to

MISS STELLA HAMILTON,
Oakthorpe, Windermere.

MARY TREFUSIS, Chairman.

W. G. McNAUGHT, Hon. Secretary.

December 20, 1910.

The idea of holding a National Memorial Competition at the Royal Albert Hall in 1911 has been abandoned.

THE AUSTRALIAN COMMONWEALTH.

Sydney, September 6.

The competition movement is being enthusiastically taken up here. It grew from the Welsh Eisteddfod, but it has been stimulated in its details by the news of what has been occurring in England. In the chief choral classes the choir from Ipswich (Queensland), conducted by Mr. Leonard Francis, achieved remarkable triumphs. They are so much elated at their victories that they contemplate a visit to the old country in order to pit themselves against some of our best choirs. Let us hope that they will be able to make the journey!

The chief classes, test-pieces, and results were as follows:

FEMALE-VOICE.

'Sweet May' (Barnby) and 'O memory' (Leslie).
Blackstone, 187; Warwick, 178.

SECOND CHORAL (Mixed Voices, Small Choirs).

Chorus, 'Achieved is the glorious work' (Haydn); part-song, 'Go, Zephyr' (Bevan); part-song, 'Moonlight' (Fanning).

Ballarat (No. 1 choir), 287; Blackstone, 263 (tie); Ballarat (No. 2 choir), 263; and Warwick, 231.

CHIEF CHORAL (Large Choirs).

Chorus, 'Thanks be to God' (Mendelssohn); part-song, 'The singers' (Mackenzie); and part-song, 'My love dwelt' (Elgar).

Blackstone, 290; Ballarat, 286; Sydney Harman's, 279; Balmain, 256; Warwick, 255; and Illawarra, 244.

MALE-VOICE CHOIRS.

'Homeward watch' (Smart); 'He who trusts in ladies fair' (Eisenhofer).

Blackstone, 185; and Wesley (Sydney), 166

Mr. Stanley Hawley, a musician well known in London musical circles, was the adjudicator. He said the high-water mark of rendering was reached in the exceptionally fine performance of rarest beauty by the Blackstone and Ipswich Cambrian choirs. 'Personally,' he said, 'I am proud of being present, for I cannot believe that such a performance can often be repeated. Every word told, and was dramatically coloured. The changes of time seemed to add meaning instead of offering obstacles. I never again expect to hear so fine a performance. I shall certainly tell Sir A. C. Mackenzie and Sir Edward Elgar how perfectly rendered the choruses were. The Ballarat Choir, under any but such very exceptional conditions, would easily have won first honours.'

Mr. Francis must be a proud man!

JERSEY.

November 15 and 16.

A highly successful 'Eisteddfod' was held here in the Oddfellows' Hall and West Park Pavilion. Perhaps the most pleasing feature was the number of the entries and the excellence of the singing in the School Choir competition. The adjudicator was Mr. Harry Evans.

The following were the chief awards:

ELEMENTARY SCHOOLS.—SIGHT-READING (5 entries).

- 1st. St. Clement's Parochial (Mr. E. Carter).
- 2nd. St. Luke's Mixed (Mr. T. E. Stent).

ACTION SONGS (age under 8).

- 1st. { St. Mark's Infants' School (Mrs. M. Wright).

CHILDREN'S CHOIRS (age under 15).

- 1st. St. Mark's Girls', Past and Present (Miss E. Carter).
- 2nd. First Tower Elementary School (Miss M. F. Plymen).

THE BLACKPOOL FESTIVAL.

A good deal has been said regarding some of the pieces used as tests at this great event, which was held in October last, and reported in our November issue. But when the criticism is analysed it is found to affect only two of the tests, viz., 'On Craig Dhu' (Delius) and 'In the midst of life' (Cornelius). The whole programme was really a splendid one, and we do not think it has been equalled by that of any other festival held at Blackpool or elsewhere. We give the whole list below:

'On Craig Dhu' is set to words by Arthur Symons, and is stated to be an 'impression of nature.' It is mostly in six parts (S.A.T.T.B.B.), but there are occasional divisions that make seven and eight parts. The tonal idiom is peculiar, the key often being indefinite, and there are many discords difficult for singers to hold firmly, especially when they occur in pp sostenuto passages. Then the rhythm exhibits some strange features that demand great sensitiveness and delicate treatment. There is no strain upon the voices. The sopranos, except for one F sharp, move in the range from E flat first line to E top space. A fine performance of this dreamy, moody piece is very striking, but anything short of this is a misery to all concerned.—W. G. McN.

BIRMINGHAM.

Professor Granville Bantock and other musicians and amateurs in Birmingham are warmly advocating the establishment of a Midlands competition to be held in this great city. In order to promote the scheme, a meeting was called at Birmingham Council House on December 1, and the Lord Mayor presided. There was an excellent audience. Addresses were delivered by Dr. McNaught and Mr. Harry Evans.

Dr. McNaught said he was a firm believer in the utility of the competition festival movement. The movement had stirred many parts of England to their musical depths. It had already accomplished much good; it was going to accomplish still more. He was exceedingly glad to know that Birmingham was going 'to toe the line.' It was about time Birmingham did, for nearly every other important centre in the country had become alive to the value of the competitive festival. The movement was about twenty years old, and during that period it had spread all over the country, until he estimated that last year quite 60,000 people competed, and he hesitated to say how many there were in the audiences—100,000 or 150,000 people at least. The appeal of the movement was to executants and to audiences. Executants obtained a knowledge of technique they could not get in any other way. It was evident that there were in the country a great number of men and women who could create and train choirs. How could they be trained to the work except through the festival movement? How did the conductors of splendid choirs gain the extraordinary skill they undoubtedly possessed? They could not get the instruction at the Academies and Colleges. The finest school of training he knew of in this country was the competitive festival. Audiences sorely needed educating. People sometimes came patronizingly and reluctantly to a festival, but after hearing a choir or two, their interest was excited, and they found it as difficult to go as it had been to induce themselves to come. The visits of eminent musicians as adjudicators to these festivals had reacted not only on the musical taste of audiences, but also on the compositions of the musicians. Then the skill evoked had led composers to create new idioms of choral writing. This had been particularly the case with Professor Bantock, who, after visits to the great festivals, was so deeply impressed that he had been inspired to compose part-songs so profoundly difficult that hardly anybody could sing them! But through the festivals, choirs would in time secure efficient interpretation of them.

The movement provided an unequalled arena for the display of amateur talent, but they did not want only the best; they tried all they could to bring in the inefficient. He counselled those who were to organize the Midlands festival to cater for all and to encourage the lowly choirs to come in. They wanted the workmen's choirs and the girls' clubs. That was the spirit of the movement—to raise the standard in the land. The question of how to secure the co-operation of elementary school-teachers in the festival was delicate ground. There was a feeling among members of the teaching profession that they should not be called upon to risk their reputation in submitting to competition the choirs they trained. It was felt that teachers might prejudice their professional career by appearing as the conductors of unsuccessful or inefficient choirs, while, as a matter of fact, more credit might be due to them than to those responsible for the training of the more successful choirs. Some teachers had not equality of opportunity. Environment and opportunity counted for so much. The difficulty had, however, been got over in other parts of the country by classifying the choirs very carefully. It would be a pity if the schools did not come into the competitions, for the movement had elevated school music teaching in a wonderful way. Then they had been told, sometimes loftily, that the competitive spirit should not be introduced into artistic matters. But he did not think they ought to be expected to cease competition on moral grounds before it had been abandoned for this reason in the Universities, the Royal Academy, the Royal College of Music, and the Midland School of Music. Then as to the festivals engendering conceit: the sum of human conceit was far less after a competition than it was before, and he declared that as at present conducted the movement was not open to the charge of pot-hunting, for the winning choirs spent more money on competitions than they ever got out of them. In conclusion, he said that competitions had proved that the potentiality of our race for choral music was great. It only awaited the advent of the skilled teacher, who could get results from any part of the country. He hoped strongly that success would attend the scheme.

Mr. Harry Evans (Liverpool) spoke of the competition movement from the Welsh point of view. He declared that in its time it had done great service in Wales. He pointed out that some time ago, when the Eisteddfod was at its best, its chief aim was artistic, but since then things had taken a wrong turn. Commercialism came in, big money-prizes were offered, and large choirs were induced to compete, to the exclusion of the smaller choirs. The consequence was that the standard of the music selected had declined, and while they got audiences of 20,000 people there was very little artistic result. Of late, however, there had been a change for the better, and the English competition movement had benefited by the mistakes in Wales and was now reacting on the Eisteddfod.

Mr. C. B. Bragg proposed a resolution affirming the desirability of holding a Midlands musical competition festival in Birmingham on dates to be subsequently fixed. The motion was seconded by Alderman G. N. Adams (Wolverhampton) and supported by the Rev. Joseph Wood, who remarked that for many years they had been trying to build up a musical public from the top, but he believed they would have to alter their plans entirely and build up from the bottom.

Others spoke in favour of the proposal, which was unanimously adopted and a committee was formed.

LONDON CHURCH CHOIR ASSOCIATION.

The third annual competition for choir boys, in connection with the above Association, was held in the Trophy Room, St. Paul's Cathedral, on October 25, 1910.

Dr. Walford Davies, organist of the Temple Church, hon. conductor of the Association, was the adjudicator.

Dr. Davies stated that this was the only competition in London, and, so far as he knew, in England, entirely devoted to church music. He commended the movement to them all, its objects being the encouragement of the love of excellence and a raising of the standard of the singing in our churches.

The tests were selected from the music for the forthcoming annual festival.

The competing choirs were: Bow Church, Cheapside; Emmanuel, West Hamstead; St. George's, Hornsey; St. Mary Stratford, Bow; and St. Saviour's, Walthamstow (the holders of the challenge shield for the past two years).

At the close of the boys' competition, a further competition for full choirs (S.A.T.B.) was held. This was a new departure, instituted by the committee this year. Only two choirs entered for this, viz., Bow Church, Cheapside, and St. Mary Stratford, Bow.

Dr. Davies, in announcing the results, stated that he had had a very difficult task to perform that evening, owing to the high standard of merit which had been shown by the competing choirs. He congratulated the choirmasters and the members of the choirs upon their beautiful tone and expression. Some minor defects had been noticed; there was still a little 'hooting' in some instances in less important parts. The 'oo' sound was an excellent one upon which to build-up the voice, but should be discarded when it has been attained, in the same way as a scaffolding was demolished upon the completion of a building. He recommended a careful attention to 'blend,' which would remove a defect noticeable in one or more choirs, which were too much dominated by the leading boy.

The following results were then announced:

BOYS' COMPETITION.

- 1st. Bow Church, Cheapside (87 marks).
- 2nd. St. George's, Hornsey (86 marks).
- Emmanuel, Hamstead (84 marks).
- St. Saviour's, Walthamstow (84 marks).
- St. Mary Stratford, Bow (76 marks).

FULL CHOIR COMPETITION.

- 1st. Bow Church, Cheapside.
- 2nd. St. Mary Stratford, Bow.

THE NORTH-EAST OF SCOTLAND MUSICAL FESTIVAL, 1911.

'CHILDREN'S DAY.'

The following circular has been sent out by the Committee:

SIR,—In August last my Committee issued a circular to all the School Boards of the area, inviting their co-operation in a 'Children's Day' to be held in Aberdeen on Friday, May 5, in connection with next year's festival. The response has been so encouraging that my Committee has resolved to complete the arrangements for holding that event. For the information of those who are interested in a very vital musical movement may I outline those arrangements? In the course of the morning and afternoon of May 5 competitions for school choirs will take place in the presence of the adjudicators, Dr. McNaught, Professor Granville Bantock, of Birmingham University, and Mr. David Stephen. There are nine classes open to school competitors:

- (1) Juvenile choirs other than day-school choirs, age under 16.
- (2) Higher grade school choirs, age under 16 years (in the published prospectus the age limit is wrongly stated to be 'above 15').
- (3) Elementary school choirs, age under 14 (Open).
- (4) Ditto, trained by non-professional musicians.
- (5) Elementary school choirs, age under 12 (Open).
- (6) Ditto, trained by non-professional musicians.
- (7) Rural elementary school choirs, age under 14.
- (8) Action songs, for children under 10.
- (9) Action songs, for children under 8.

The afternoon will close with a massed performance, by the children's choirs, of George Rathbone's cantata, 'Vogelweid the Minnesinger,' which Dr. McNaught will conduct. If practicable it will be sung to orchestral accompaniment. My Committee is taking steps to arrange for the service of excursion trains throughout the area on 'Children's Day.' I shall be pleased to furnish information to any inquirers.—Yours faithfully,

The University, Aberdeen, C. SANFORD TERRY
December 10, 1910. (Hon. Sec.).

LEAMINGTON. NEW FESTIVAL.

A NEW festival is announced to be held here on June 8, 9 and 10, under excellent auspices. On the first day the competitions are open only to Warwickshire districts, and there are ten classes for solo singing, violin and pianoforte solo, children's action-songs, school classes, and church and chapel choirs. The second and third days are open to all-comers. There are classes for solo singing, instrumental performances, male-voice quartets, ladies'-voice choirs, church and chapel choirs, choral societies, vocal quartets and male-voice choirs. The adjudicators will be Dr. McNaught and Mr. Granville Humphreys. The secretary is Mrs. Bernard Green, Svea, Milverton Terrace, Leamington.

ON November 26, at the St. George's Hall, Kendal, the Blackpool Glee and Madrigal Society gave a lengthy and varied choral recital in aid of the funds of the Westmorland Festival. The audience was large and appreciative, the greater proportion being singers who make up the Westmorland Choir. The late Miss Wakefield was to have been the patroness of the concert. The opening chorus, sung 'In memoriam,' was Bach's exultant 'Death, I do not fear thee,' from 'Jesu, priceless treasure.' The choir sang no fewer than twenty-four items, drawn from Bach, Marston, Tchaikovsky, Mendelssohn, Cornelius, Schumann, Schubert, Brahms (six selections), Berlioz, César Cui, Max Bruch, Debussy, Delius, Bantock and Elgar. Mr. Arthur Catterall played Bach's 'Chaconne' and several lighter solos, accompanied by Mr. George Rathbone. Artistically, this friendly visit paid to the cradle of competitions, by a choir which would not have been in existence to-day but for the beneficent influence exercised by Miss Wakefield, was a great success, and between £20 and £30 will be wiped off the festival debt.

WE very much regret to hear that it has been found necessary to abandon the Kensington and West London Festival, announced to be held this month. The entries were not numerous enough to justify the committee in proceeding. Under any circumstances, we think the date chosen was an unfortunate one, and its disadvantages were aggravated by the distractions of the election.

In response to several correspondents, we have to say that we do not know whether the Festival Association, whose address was 175-6, Piccadilly, London, will carry out the scheme of competition festivals announced to be held this Spring. There are no names of individuals on the only prospectus that has reached us. This Association has nothing whatever to do with the Association of Competition Festivals.

"THE TIMES"

says of Macdonald Smith's teaching—"The excellence of his methods has been abundantly proved."

You are not asked when you take up the Macdonald Smith System of Perfect Pianoforte Playing to understand anything of the science on which it is founded. All the scientific work has been done for you, and you have only to follow plain rules and carry out simple exercises; the "excellence of his methods" then appears of itself.

A Mus. Bac. says: "I would not be without your exercises for ten times the fee."

Write for "Light on Pianoforte Playing," post-free.

PLAY MUSIC AT SIGHT.

You cannot derive much pleasure from your playing unless you can play at first sight. Years of practising for many hours daily may enable you to become a good sight-player, but you can be certain of obtaining a much greater proficiency by the aid of the Ehremayer System of Pianoforte Sight-Playing in three months of about 15 minutes' daily practising.

Some Extracts from Pupils' Letters recently received:—

I have tried several pieces at first sight, and although I could not play everything absolutely perfectly, I played them as near perfect as could be expected of any one at first sight, i.e., to my own satisfaction, at any rate.

I attribute my vast improvement chiefly to your systematic training of the eye, by which one gains so much more self-confidence, doing away with all feeling of hesitation.

Also I consider that your System does not finish with the end of the Course, but that by following on, on the same lines, one can still go on improving his powers in sight-playing at the same time as he is improving his technique.

Wrexham,

A. G.

On the whole, your system has been invaluable to me, and I shall most certainly recommend it to my friends who are musically inclined.

Before taking up your Course, I was unable to play an average song accompaniment correctly at first sight, but now my friends are astonished at my progress, and I myself feel particularly pleased about it.

With reference to hymns, psalm settings, anthems, &c., of which I play a good number, these are ridiculously easy to me.

I thank you for the kind and prompt attention you have given to me throughout the whole Course, and for the instructions, which I have found most useful.

H. J.

Booklet describing the System sent free to any pianist.

THEODOR MÜLLER-REUTER.

In May, 1910, Professor Müller-Reuter, of Crefeld (or Krefeld), Germany, paid a four weeks' visit to London. During this short period he paid many visits to the two opera houses then open (Covent Garden and His Majesty's), and to concerts given by the Philharmonic Society, Queen's Hall, and the London Symphony Orchestras. In our columns last August (p. 513) he recorded his impressions rather fully. Some of his remarks were flattering to our amour-propre. He declared that the 'wonderful orchestral tone of the orchestras without any doubt exceeded that of the German orchestras' in its round, full quality; and he said that this beauty of tone had something bewitching in it, 'the purity of intonation was excellent and the orchestral discipline truly remarkable.' Further, he said that the blending of string and wind tone alike in pp and ff was so perfect that one could say that the wind-tone was embraced by the strings. The introduction gained by Müller-Reuter to London musical society and his appreciation of our musical doings resulted in the Professor determining to perform Elgar's A flat Symphony in Crefeld, and in the London Symphony Orchestra inviting him to conduct one of their concerts. Both events have recently happened. The Elgar Symphony was performed on December 17, at Crefeld, under the direction of the composer, and Professor Müller-Reuter says it was the greatest success the orchestra had enjoyed in recent years. Then, on January 16 this year, the Professor conducted the London Symphony Orchestra through the following programme:

Overture, Benvenuto Cellini	...	...	Berlioz.
Symphony No. 3, in E flat (Eroica)	...	...	Beethoven.
Nocturne, 'Paris'

( 'The song of a great city' )	Frederick Delius.
Till Eulenspiegel's merry Pranks (Op. 28)	Richard Strauss.

Miss Gerhardt sang, with the orchestra, an arietta (Nourmahal's song from Moore's 'Lalla Rookh,' by Weber, the orchestral arrangement of which was by Müller-Reuter, and some songs by Hugo Wolf, in delightful performances of which she was accompanied on the pianoforte by the Professor. This programme was well calculated to test the conductor's powers, and it is satisfactory to record that the performance of all the numbers exhibited the first-rate capacity of our guest. All was clear and finished, and while there were no indications of a desire to get special effects, one felt that the interpretation of the composer was the aim. The Delius piece was not known to the Professor until he was asked to conduct it on this occasion, and therefore it is not a little remarkable that he secured the best performance of this curious work that we have heard in London. Many of our readers will no doubt be glad to know some particulars of the career of a musician who views English music and musicians so sympathetically, and who may do much to make our composers known in Germany.

Theodor Müller-Reuter was born on September 1, 1858, at Dresden. His father was a teacher of various musical instruments, and thus the atmosphere of his childhood was favourable to his musical development. He soon exhibited talent as a pianist, and became a pupil of Wieck (Clara Schumann's father) and of his son, Alwin Wieck. By the time he was twelve years of age he had gained such facility that he went about as a 'wonder child.' His ordinary education was private, as he was not able to attend school regularly. He took pianoforte lessons also from Madame Schumann when she came to Dresden, and later, when she settled in Berlin, he travelled thither once a week to secure her aid. This involved his leaving Dresden at 4 a.m. in order to take his pianoforte lesson at 11 a.m. Later in the day he went to Bargiel for lessons in composition, and then he returned to Dresden on the same evening. A hard pilgrimage this, in the cause of musical culture! He also, at Dresden, studied composition under Meinardus, Ernst Julius Otto and Julius Rietz. Soon after this period, Müller-Reuter went to reside at Frankfurt, and here, at the Hoch Conservatorium, Madame Schumann, who was on the staff, continued her lessons, and the young musician also came under the influence of Joachim Raff, and in vocal matters of Stockhausen. In 1879 he went to Strassbourg as teacher of pianoforte in the town Conservatoire of Music, and whilst here he met with a disaster that altered the rut of his life. He over-practised, with the result that he strained his right wrist badly, the injury later extending up the arm, and also developing in his left arm. Practice was impossible; his projected career as a solo pianist had to be abandoned, and for five years he could not play. Only slowly did he regain muscular control and resume playing for ordinary purposes. In 1887 he returned to Dresden with the idea of becoming a conductor. Here he secured a position as conductor of a male-voice choir, a mixed-voice choir, and a very good amateur orchestra. He also became a teacher in the Conservatorium, and altogether made considerable progress. In 1893 he was invited to Crefeld in order to undertake the conductorship of the Konzert-Gesellschaft. This was a tempting offer, which was readily accepted because the resources included a capable orchestra of 60 or 70 performers, and a choir (mixed) of 250 voices, reputed to be one of the best in the Rhineland. It had been conducted by Grüters, and the repertory of the Society included oratorios and cantatas of the highest class, and all the classical symphonies and overtures. Until Müller-Reuter arrived the orchestral repertory was rather too conservative, inasmuch as it was confined to the generally accepted classics, with Schumann and Brahms as last words.

Liszt, Berlioz, and Wagner were never heard. It was not long however before the outlook was greatly expanded. The Society gave the first performance in Germany of Berlioz's 'Faust' in the language in which it was composed, namely, French. The Professor believes that only thus is the work truly effective.

Crefeld is an important manufacturing town. It is situated four miles from the left bank of the Rhine, and is twelve miles north-west of Düsseldorf. Its products are chiefly silk and velvet, but there are numerous other industries. The population is about 140,000. The townsfolk are distinctly musical. As in numerous other towns in Germany, there are many male-voice choirs and fewer mixed-voice choirs, and hardly any female-voice choirs as separate organizations. A town orchestra is granted £1,000 a year, and an opera house has a subsidy of £1,500 a year. Without this subsidy opera would be 'impossible' in this town, as it would be in almost every centre in Europe—a fact that must always be borne in mind when the success of opera abroad is compared with apparent non-success in this country. The Society which Professor Müller-Reuter conducts has also a small grant of £100 a year, but it is mainly self-supporting. When deficits arise, as they often do, the hat has to be sent round—a process with which we are only too familiar in England. The choir is made up of the best people in the town and is, as stated above, a very capable body. Professor Müller-Reuter says that they acquire their musical ability rather through their general musical education than from any direct teaching of sight-singing, &c. Chamber music is very popular, and no doubt that tends to cultivate an all-round capacity. The school children are not taught sight-singing, their musical practice consisting of folk-songs. But a scheme of sight-singing study is now under discussion, and will probably be adopted.

In 1902 the Kaiser made his first visit to the town, and was so much impressed by the cordiality of his reception and the importance of the place, that he resolved to raise it to the dignity of a garrison town. In 1906 the Kaiser himself led the Hussar Regiment into the town for the occupation of the new barracks. Music was a conspicuous feature of the reception, and the arrangements for it were entrusted to Professor Müller-Reuter. A grand-stand accommodated 1,500 school children who had been musically trained by the Professor. It had been arranged that the choir should sing a setting of Schiller's 'Freude Schöner Götterfunken' and a cavalier song, 'Wohlauf Kameraden aufs Pferd,' whilst the procession passed along. But the Kaiser, on reaching the stand, called a halt and listened to the singing, with which he was deeply moved.

The occasion to which Sir Edward Elgar was invited in order to conduct his Symphony was the seventy-fifth anniversary of the establishment of the organization. A handsome book of seventy or more pages was issued in honour of the event. It gives a full history of the Society, and portraits of many musicians who are or have been connected with it. Portraits of Elgar and Max Schillings (who was present at the festival) are also given. In the account of the choral works performed, we note that Bach's B minor Mass appears eight times, the same composer's 'St. Matthew' Passion ten times, Brahms's 'Requiem' eight times, Handel's 'Messiah' ten times, Mendelssohn's 'Elijah' fourteen times, and 'St. Paul' ten times. Of Schumann's works the most favoured have been 'Paradise and the Peri' and the scenes from 'Faust,' each of which has been performed seven times. Elgar's 'Dream of Gerontius' figures once in the list.

Among the Professor's compositions, 'Das Lied des Sturmes' ('The Song of the Tempest'), for double choir and orchestra, is a work that might very well engage the attention of British Choral Societies. It is published in vocal score, with the words in English and German, and as it belongs to the school of writing that studies the limitations of the human voice, and the possibilities of choralists of average capacity, it can be approached without fear and trembling. There are some powerful choral effects in the work. It takes thirteen minutes to perform. 'The burial of Hackelberend,' the words of which are from Julius Wolff's poem 'Der Wilde Jäger,' is also entirely for chorus and orchestra. It contains seven numbers.

Professor Müller-Reuter adds to his musical capacity an unassuming and genial personality. We trust the reciprocity of feeling which has brought him before us will be continued. We are glad to hear that he purposes attending the International Musical Congress, which is to be held in London in May this year.

MUSIC AND PICTURES.

By ERNEST NEWMAN.

The very abstract æstheticians who set their faces against all forms of instrumental music that derive support from concrete suggestions of art or life have evidently never thought out the problem of the interpretation of music and the other arts. So long as each of these keeps hankering after something that it is the special business of the others to supply, it is clearly impossible to regard the several artistic faculties as existing in watertight compartments,—this man being solely a painter, this one solely a poet, and another solely a musician. While the theorists have been busy trying to settle the frontiers of the arts, the practitioners have kept removing or muddling-up the boundary posts with a refreshing indifference to theory. Some day, perhaps, we shall arrive at the rational point of view that our artistic perceptions are no more partitioned off from each other than our senses in general. We all know that there is a real difference between taste and smell, but none of us can say where the one ends and the other begins in any particular instance. Do not eye and ear, again, co-operate in a thousand of the apparently undifferentiated sense-impressions we get every hour? And how much of the disagreeable sensation that the sight of certain fabrics gives us is due to the memory of the unpleasant tactile sensations that they have given us at some previous time? Our physical and mental systems follow the law of all complex organizations—there is both specialisation and interchange of function. So it is, surely, with our artistic faculties. No man, perhaps, is wholly poet, or painter, or musician; he is predominantly one of these, but he still keeps up a few roads of communication with the others, narrow in some cases, broad in others,—Bach, Schubert and Berlioz, for example, always seeing things with a painter's eye. How else, indeed, can we explain the eternal desire of one type of artist to translate the products of another genre of art into terms of his own? The musician is always turning poetry or prose—or even pictures, as in the case of Liszt's Hunnen-schlacht—into music; the poet and the painter are always trying to re-express musical sensations and ideas in their own special media of words or line and colour. The curious thing, however, is that music is at once the most adventurous of the arts in this respect, and the most successful. It has taken complete possession, for example, of certain poems, or poetic or pictorial subjects, and made it impossible for us ever to think of them again without the music. The poets, on the other hand, though they have said many finely characteristic things about music, have never succeeded in producing anything like a satisfactory substitute for it. The music of a Schubert, a Schumann, or a Wolf will swallow up the words of a Goethe or a Heine; no case can be cited of a poet saying the same thing so much more finely than the musician that the poem is felt at once to comprehend the music and to irradiate it, as the 'Erl-King' of Schubert does the 'Erl-King' of Goethe. And it must be confessed that while music has often made a good show in translating pictures into its own terms, the painters, as a rule, have not thrown much new light on the creations of the musicians.

Is this the fault of the individuals, or is it the result of something in the natures of the two arts? In many cases, certainly, it is the former. Now and then, it is true, we meet with an artist who, without being a musician himself, can fasten intuitively upon the seminal points of a musical character or scene, and raise something of the same suggestion in us by his drawing of it. Fantin-Latour was an instance of this kind. No one has ever 'illustrated' a musician as he has done Berlioz and Wagner; I know of nothing by any other artist in this line to compare with his lithographs of Rienzi in prayer, the Rhine maidens in the first scene of the 'Rhinegold,' the Rhine maidens and Siegfried, Klingsor and Kundry, the Ball scene in the 'Symphonie Fantastique,' the casting of the Perseus statue in 'Benvenuto Cellini,' Juliet on the balcony, 'Sara la Baigneuse,' the Repose of the Holy Family in 'L'Enfance du Christ,' and the Apparition of Hector in 'La Prise de Troie.' But even Fantin-Latour fails at times; and both his successes and his failures give us a hint as to where the opportunities and the difficulties of the painter lie with regard to music. It looks as if, from the very nature of his art, he had nothing like the freedom and range of the musician. Music, that is to say, can reproduce much more of the spirit of a picture than the artist can of the spirit of a musical work. Music is better at the pictorial than painting is at the psychological. It will be noticed that Fantin-Latour is always most successful when the problem given him by the musician is less psychological than purely pictorial. He fails with Isolde, for example. By choosing the moment when she is waving the signal to Tristan, in the garden at night, he evades the crucial difficulty of the painter—that of expressing in the face of the character all the wealth of emotion there is in the music; but even then his Isolde is too missish to impress us as being anything like the Isolde of Wagner. Fantin-Latour's success as a musical illustrator is probably due to his instinctive seizure upon the more graphic scenes of Berlioz and Wagner and his avoidance of the psychological. In his beautiful lithograph of Alberich and the Rhine maidens, for example, he wisely concentrates our attention on the graceful swimming figures and the swirling water; he feels, perhaps, that most of what Wagner has put into Alberich is beyond the artist, so he merely half-shows us the back of him in shade. Fantin-Latour's very avoidance, indeed, of certain of the Wagnerian scenes and characters suggests that he was conscious of how much of the soul of music the painter is barred out from,—in other words, that he himself was a musician as well as an artist. Conversely, the attempts made by other men to translate into line and colour the most untranslatable elements in music, indicate that they have little or nothing of the musical faculty in them.

Some striking verifications of this fact may be seen in Mr. Arthur Rackham's recent illustrations to the 'Rhinegold' and the 'Valkyrie.'* Mr. Rackham, indeed, was hardly the best man for the work in any case; with all his dexterity and all his charm, he is at once too fantastic and too much of a mannerist for music of the scope and intensity of Wagner's. Delightful as the pictures are in their own way, no one who knows the 'Ring' can feel most of them to be anything else but complete failures to translate Wagner's music into line and paint. In Mr. Rackham, of course, the decorative artist comes first, and the psychologist is a very bad second. He sees life too fantastically or romantically, or too much as a pretty arrangement of outlines and tints, to be able to get deep down to the brains of things. The very qualities that made his Peter Pan so charming were bound to be his worst enemies when he came to handle Wagner. His chief error is that he is prone to turn a musical conception that is so moving because it is so truly human, into a pretext for mere decoration. In the exquisite picture facing page 102, for example—Brynhilde looking down from the rock—his main concern has plainly not been with Wagner's Brynhilde at all, but simply with a woman as part of a picturesque pictorial pattern. There is no suggestion whatever of Brynhilde in face or form; the face is merely a means of concentrating the light on the centre of the dark tree at the back, and the robe, breast-plate, dagger, and winged helmet are little more than pretexts for carrying through the middle of the picture the note of blue in the mountains and in the sky. So again with Brynhilde leading her horse down the path to the cave; the face, to which we at once look for some sign by which we can recognise the Brynhilde of Wagner, is a piece of purely conventional prettiness. The design has clearly been Mr. Rackham's main interest—the problem of the arrangement of the vertical and horizontal lines of tree-trunks and branches, and the curved lines of the horse's head—and Brynhilde is a mere accessory. There is the same overriding of the psychological by the pictorial interest in the picture of Brynhilde and Grani at the mouth of the cave (page 122). Here, indeed, there is an attempt—and not an unsuccessful one—to suggest in the Valkyrie's face something of the stern pathos of the music in the wonderful scene between Brynhilde and Siegmund. But the eye only finds the face at all after a conscious quest, instead of it being the most salient motive of the drawing. What has really fascinated Mr. Rackham has been the possibilities of wavy line in the Valkyrie's robe, her hair, the horse's mane, and the branches of the trees. It is again an exquisite picture, and again not Wagner. And the question at once arises, Has Mr. Rackham ever heard Wagner's music? I do not mean by that whether he has ever sat in a theatre and listened to a performance of the 'Ring'; presumably he has done this. The question rather is, what did Mr. Rackham hear? He apparently did not hear the music as we musicians do. No man, surely, who had realised the depth and dignity and warmth of the music that Wagner has given to Brynhilde could turn her into the pretty, well-groomed thing that Mr. Rackham makes of her. Or is it that the heroic is hopelessly beyond his reach? He sentimentalises Siegmund and Sieglinde in the great scene where the former draws the sword from the ash-tree's stem; in the picture facing page 88 (Sieglinde preparing Hunding's draught for the night) she is simply a beautifully gowned lady with a Burne-Jones face, by no means the wife or mother of a hero, or the carrier of the action of a drama as wide as the cosmos itself; in the picture of Hunding, Siegmund and Sieglinde at table (p. 82), she is again no more than a nicely-dressed and charming hostess, while poor Siegmund suggests a tramp who has been kindly asked in for a meal. Mr. Rackham, apparently, has not Fantin-Latour's sense of his own limitations and those of his special art.

Many of Mr. Rackham's failures—I call them failures, of course, from the Wagnerian and the musical points of view; the pictures are mostly exquisite enough as mere decorations—no doubt come from the impossibility of painting ever compassing the emotional intensity of music at its greatest. But beyond that, Mr. Rackham's inability to curb the fantastic in him sometimes causes him to make almost nonsense of Wagner. His Alberich, Mime, Fasolt and Fafner are only illustrations to a fairy-tale; he apparently sees nothing of the real driving force in the character of each of them, and his capricious imagination exaggerates the grotesque in them with the most disastrous effects. Here again one asks whether Mr. Rackham has ever heard Wagner's music, in the full sense of the word 'hearing.' Could anyone who has trembled in his seat in the theatre when the orchestra let loose its flood of hatred and anger as Alberich drove the cowed Nibelungs before him, ever conceive the scene in the rather childish way that Mr. Rackham shows it us? On the other hand, where fantasy obviously ought to have almost the first and last word, Mr. Rackham is more successful, as in his study of Loge. The illustrations as a whole, however, pleasing as they are as essays in pure decoration, leave us wondering how far the pictorial mind is capable of understanding great music, or at all events of translating it into its own special media. If any painters ought to understand Wagner, it is the Germans; but we have only to look at the pictorial monstrosities that make the shop windows of Bayreuth hideous during the festival to see that almost the whole of the finest essence of the music has escaped the artists. But surely we shall have some day a picture of Brynhilde or Sieglinde, let us say, that shall express in line and colour at any rate something of the grandeur and the pathos that Wagner has poured about them in his music?

THE DANCING ENGLISH.*

BY E. PHILLIPS BARKER.

Three hundred years ago, a facetious admirer of old Harry Rudge the taborer—'Sweet Hereford Hall'—implored him to bequeath his 'velom-spotted skin to cover Tabor's, at the sound of which to set all the shires a dauncing.' Now it may be that old Hal took this sportive gentleman's hint—that one of these witching 'dubs,' after three centuries of varied fortune, came by a last vicissitude, unrecognized, into the hands of one of the authors of the 'Morris Book,' and proceeded subtly to fulfil its mission in a new way. At any rate it would be an excellent story. Certainly to-day the shires are once more putting themselves in 'morris-ray,' and the 'Morris Book' stirs behind this pleasing portent and adds a moving sequel to the chequered history of the Morris-dance.

* 'The 'Morris Book,' Parts I.-III.: C. J. Sharp and H. C. Macilwaine. (Novello & Co.)

In the middle of the 15th century one Wetenhale made a will. Amongst other things he left a cup 'sculpt cum moreys-dance.' And so in an assured position as an object of the silversmith's art, the Morris-dance makes its first appearance in England under that name. Not that this was its first appearance in a wider sense: folk-lore shows the dance to be an essential part of folk-customs common to England and the Continent, and of immemorial antiquity. The authors of the 'Morris Book' gave, in 1907, a hesitating assent to the theory of a Moorish origin. It is unlikely that they would do so to-day. What is plain without appealing to folk-lore, but only to the desultory notices of the dance, is that from the middle of the 15th century to the end of the Tudor period at least, it rode on a waxing wave of popularity. The Elizabethan writers teem with references to its bells and napkins, its scarves and other finery, its attendant grotesques. Churchwardens' accounts note expenditure on the outfit of the parish Morris. No revel was complete without it. Henry Machyn saw morris-dances galore, in strange and varied company: once with Jack o' Lent, his wife, his priest, and 'ys fezyssioun' (alas for the lost art of truly great spelling!); at another time three morris-dances together, with giants, 'duwylls' and other delights. Master Will Kemp, Shakespeare's fellow-actor, made the Morris an occasion for one of those vulgar professional tests of endurance which are always among the abuses of a vogue. We forgive him 'the horrible dance to Norwich' (the just stigma is Dekker's) in consideration of the lively record of his 'pleasure, pains and kind entertainment' he has left us in 'Kemp's Nine Daies Wonder.'

With the growth of Puritanism, the Morris tide ebbed back into the remoter villages whence it originally must have set outward, yet by a curious irony it is Philip Stubbes whose very virulence has given us the most spirited account of a great village morris. He pictures for us the 'lustie Guttes' decked with 'scarfs, ribbons & laces hanged all ouer with golde rings, precious stones, & other iewels,' twenty or forty bells about either leg, 'rich handkercheifs in their hands, and sometimes laid a crosse ouer their shoulders and necks . . . their bels iynghing, their handkercheifs swinging about their heds like madmen, their hobbie horses and other monsters skirmishing amongst the route.'

Stubbes and his friends won the day: they could not, however, kill: they could only maim. But industrialism, with the incurious 18th century gentility and 19th century indifference, carried on, and had well nigh completed, the decline. Nothing has been more disquieting than the attitude of the Englishman to his indigenous arts in their extremity. A rich store of dance and song has been passing away. While old singers were dying and carrying with them into silence a treasure of melody, musicians in the main were long deaf to the delicate product of their own oil. While morris-sides were everywhere being disbanded, and the spirit of rhythmic motion was yearly vanishing from the countryside, the chorographer, the dancer, the light-footed and light-hearted were blind.

So the publication in 1907 of the first part of the 'Morris Book' broke fresh ground. It is not too much to say that before its appearance the Morris-dance was, to the mass of people, no more than a quaint old-world name, hazily associated with May-day, maypoles, village greens, Strephon and Chloe, ribbons, amiable rusticity, and a comfortably vague clamjamfrey of Merrie-Englandism.

The 'Morris Book' has gone far towards changing all this. It was the first, and remains the only systematic attempt to record from genuine tradition the step, style and structure of the Morris-dance in its surviving forms, wherever these could be found. The eleven dances that first saw the light, eight of them drawn from Headington, near Oxford, proved by their shapeliness and charm the claim of the Morris to rank high as a form of folk-art. So strong was their appeal, so rapid their advance in favour, that those who knew a good thing when they saw it were soon calling for more. The call was met by the further instalment of Headington dances forming the second part. Finally, after an interval of another year, came the third part, containing dances from other Oxfordshire traditions, from Gloucestershire and Northamptonshire, with two fine Derbyshire specimens, hybrids of country-dance and Morris-dance. Twenty-nine team-dances and fourteen solo jigs (reckoning variants) are now before the public.

This gives an excellent scope and variety to the dancer, or would-be dancer, to whom the book is mainly addressed. For those in search of ground principles, it is perhaps still too small a collection to invite generalization. Not till all possible sources have been tapped and the results are available, will the time come for the affirmation or denial of a norm. Yet even so, we are not driven to look for the unity of the Morris only in some undefined inner spirit or general outward effect. A spirit it has—a spirit of high artistic restraint amid all its fire and virility. But the wider range of tradition touched in the last part begins to show above all things, not less remarkably in variation than in correspondence, that the Morris is a single form of expression with well-marked structure and technique. Still, definition may well wait its season. To-day we may say that for us the Morris is 'Trunkles' and 'Shooting,' 'Hunting the Squirrel,' and 'The Flowers of Edinburgh,' 'Leapfrog' and things of that kind. It is dual rhythm of foot and hand—clear-cut rhythm linked with strong and stirring music—it is the sway and swagger of the Back-step; the sweeping flourish of the Show; the butterfly hover of the hands in 'Brighton Camp': it is that Half-caper in which the dancer for an instant seems to soar on wings: it is the Straddle, hardily angular. All these things the Morris is—and a pure delight!

Indeed, if the traditional Morris is all but a sapless trunk, it has assuredly maintained to the last some very green and vigorous shoots, for all the dances in these volumes are excellent. It is perhaps invidious to choose, but were this writer called on to name the five best, he would say: 'The Flowers of Edinburgh,' 'Brighton Camp,' the beautiful second version of 'Shepherd's Hey,' 'Trunkles,' and 'Rigs o' Marlow.' Of the jigs, 'Princess Royal' (first version) very narrowly robs 'Jockie to the Fair' of the palm. The four variants of the 'Bacca-pipes Jig' stand by themselves: prettiest are the third and fourth: the first involves the greatest risk of failure. For sheer quaintness and a spice of mystery, the 'Shepherd's Hey' jig, with its curious ritual touchings of calves, breast, cheeks and head, deserves a mention.

Technically, the 'Morris Book' shows an ascending progression in its three parts. In the first, good as it is, one feels that the writers were dealing with matter hardly familiar, and their expression of it is correspondingly tentative—sometimes even obscure. In general these blemishes are small, but in the description of the Morris-step, for example, there is a loose grip and lack of lucidity in passages, which must have cost many a beginner a frowning brow. A later additional note seems to show that the authors themselves felt this. Yet their method as a whole, handled as they proceed with increasing assurance and precision, proves fully equal to the strain put upon it by the complex dances of the last part.

One always hesitates to say that any more or less elaborate form of physical exercise can be learned wholly from a book, and perhaps the 'Morris Book' is not entirely an exception to this rule. The compromise between freedom and restraint—the difference between mechanical accuracy and style—is subtle, hard to catch and prison on the printed page; but up to this point the authors have spared no pains to strike the mean between brevity and fulness, to avoid overloading description and precept, while leaving no gaps to be filled according to the learner's taste or inventive power. And if the teacher is not thereby rendered quite superfluous, no amount of teaching can make the book other than indispensable to those who would know the Morris as it should be known.

If we have a quarrel with the writers it is that they have been too severely practical. We see Mr. Kimber (most lissom of dancers!) in his bells, with ribbons 'laid a crosse over his shoulders,' as Stubbes saw them: we see the Bidford men and the Winster men in varieties of that costume, at rest or in motion. But we miss sorely in the text some account of the different traditions represented, the customs associated with the Morris in each case—peradventure, too, what manner of men were Agamemnon and the mighty ones who lived before him—with much more that might appeal to the folk-lorist, to the lover of the country and its folk, of what is old and plain and of fair report—that might, too, awake in the dancer of the revival the sense that he takes his place as one of an ancient and honourable company, as heir to a tradition no less ancient and honourable, not lightly to be tinkered at, moulded or altered to suit mere amusement or personal whim.

But doubtless these things lurk in the authors' notebooks, and it is with some good reason that they have said their nonumque prematur in annum. And, in the interim, a Fourth Part . . . ?

ROYALTY AGREEMENTS.

THE SOCIETY OF BRITISH COMPOSERS.

A year ago, in our issue of February, 1910, we called attention to a feature of the Law of Contract which is apt, in exceptional cases, to affect prejudicially the rights of composers in works the copyright of which they have assigned to publishers on Royalty agreements. It was pointed out that in such cases the law holds that the contract between the parties is a purely personal undertaking, which binds the publisher only so long as he continues to publish and sell his own copies of the work. The contract to pay the Royalty does not run with the copyright in the same way as a covenant to pay rent, or other covenant affecting land, runs with the land. The result of this is that, while the original publisher can free himself from his liability to pay the Royalty by parting with his copyright, voluntarily or otherwise, his assignee, whether a purchaser or a trustee in bankruptcy, becomes entitled to the copyright without any concurrent obligation to pay the Royalty. In our article we reflected on this state of the law by referring to it as an injustice, and it is an injustice for which some sort of remedy ought to be provided.

A decided protest was made against the existing state of the Law, before Lord Gorell's Copyright Committee in 1909, by a witness on behalf of the Society of British Composers, who presented to the Committee a badly drawn Bill which purported to provide a suggested remedy. It was however pointed out to the witness that the hardship complained of had nothing to do with the law of copyright, and that it rested with the composer to protect himself by inserting some suitable clauses in his contract with his original publisher. Notwithstanding this rather obvious view of the position, Lord Gorell's Committee eventually made a recommendation in favour of a proposed alteration of the law on the lines advocated on behalf of the Society of British Composers.

The Legislature however evidently did not see its way to interfere with the general law of contract, by drawing distinctions between copyright and other forms of personal property; for the recommendation of Lord Gorell's Committee was not adopted, and the New Copyright Bill of July 26, 1910, affords no relief against the hardship complained of.

Composers therefore have been driven to avail themselves of the hint thrown out by Lord Gorell's Committee. They must protect themselves by their contract. And the Society of British Composers has been setting itself to work to devise some means of protection on those lines. Their grievance is stated, with more emphasis than restraint, in a pamphlet which embodies the result of their deliberations at a meeting held on November 29 ult.; and the recommendation they make is that, for the future, when a composer entrusts his work to a publisher on a Royalty agreement, he should not assign his copyright to the publisher, but should grant only a licence to last as long as the publisher himself continues to publish and sell the copies, and pays the Royalties. It is explained that by adopting this method the composer would be in a position to assume control of his copyright if for any reason, voluntarily or under legal stress, the publisher might retire from his position as publisher of the work. 'Under reasonable safeguards we do not think that any publisher is likely to quarrel with this scheme. But the reasonable safeguards must be found, otherwise new hardships are likely to arise in the place of the old.

A little light might advantageously be thrown on the following points :

1. If the composer retains his copyright, who will be entitled to sue for infringements of the right. Can a licensee sue or take criminal proceedings while the composer retains the copyright?
2. If not, will the composer undertake to sue when called upon by the licensee to do so. And if he will not give that undertaking, how is the licensee to protect himself against infringements, and pirates?
3. If the composer does give the undertaking, and afterwards assigns his Royalties, will the liability on that undertaking bind the assignee of the Royalties. If not, how is the licensee to protect himself against infringements, and pirates?
4. Who is to bear the costs of any legal proceedings for the protection of a copyright, having regard to the fact that at any moment for various reasons a licence may come to an end?
5. Would the conversion of the business of a firm of publishers into a limited company, or the amalgamation of two or more firms into one partnership or company, with a view to improving the financial position of all of them, be such an assignment as would involve the cancellation of all the licences held by all of them?
6. If the object of the composers is merely to protect their Royalties as against fraudulent or impecunious assignees, what will they do with the capital value of the publication, which will revert to them as an 'unearned increment' whenever a licence for any reason comes to an end?
7. Is it suggested that on the death or retirement of a publisher who has no partners, and who publishes exclusively under Royalty agreements, his entire catalogue is to revert to the various composers whose works he published, and that his entire business is to be practically wiped out?

We suggest to the Society of British Composers that they give their careful consideration to difficulties of the kind indicated above, and that they do not risk a good cause by seeking to gain too much.

Occasional Notes.

From Webster's Dictionary :

CHOPIN : A liquid measure formerly used in France and Great Britain, varying from half-a-pint to a wine quart.

WAGNERITE : A fluophosphate of magnesia occurring in yellowish crystals, etc.

The news that His Majesty the King had conferred the honour of knighthood on Henry J. Wood, was received by the community with universal approbation and satisfaction. His life-work at Queen's Hall, London, and in connection with numerous musical festivals, has made his personality familiar to musicians and amateurs throughout the land. The new knight has done more than any other man living to create, educate, and feed the taste for orchestral music that is now a great factor in the musical life of the nation. We shall have more to say next month on his career. Meantime we offer him our sincere congratulations and best wishes.

That a wider acquaintance with music can be obtained by listening to performances than by providing one's own performance is a proposition that holds good in more than ninety-nine cases out of a hundred. Yet in a similar preponderance of cases musical experiences, especially those of the younger generation, are confined to the home-made article—the wearisome pianoforte lesson or the shop ballad sung by an elder sister. Only when they reach the adult stage do many people discover at orchestral concerts, chamber concerts, or opera performances, that they have an untutored liking for good music. Lately, some energetic propagandists have seized upon this prevailing fact as a fault to be remedied. Mr. Stewart Macpherson is carrying on an enlightened campaign of musical-appreciation study, and now Miss Gwynne Kimpton appears as the organizer and conductor of orchestral concerts for the young, the first of which is noticed in another column. The best feature of the scheme is the introductory lecture by Dr. Borland. The doubtful point is whether the music was all wisely chosen. The studied formalism and elegance (we risk a tirade of indignant expostulation) of classical music will often fall unheeded upon ears that would perhaps be attracted by something more romantic in melody, or by music imbued with the spirit of dance rhythms, neither of which is necessarily outside the category of 'good' music. We hope Miss Kimpton will take heed of the free advice on this subject that has been lavished upon her in many quarters, and in any case we wish her success in her venture.

The affaire Glover-Tchaikovsky has not yet reached the courts, although with the law of libel in its present state of stringency, it may get there yet. The lively discussion in the Press is quiescent, but it may burst forth afresh, for the Drury Lane pantomime is still on the boards and may be expected to remain there till the late spring. The trouble is this. Mr. Glover—the Mr. Glover, of Drury Lane—has taken the second subject of the first movement of Tchaikovsky's 'Symphonie pathétique,' and made his chorus sing it to a verse about a silver 'Harp of Love.' Our first criticism is that the tune is by no means a good setting of the words (we hope Tchaikovsky's descendants will not take action). But what dastardly sacrilege it is, we are told, thus to take from their fit and proper environment the unutterable outpourings of a great man's soul. Socialism in music! What will they seize upon next—perhaps Strauss's 'Elektra'; nay, even his 'Symphonia domestica'; or perhaps they will ravish the whole-tone scale! Seriously, Mr. Glover scored a point when he spoke of 'amusement-seekers, many of whom have never heard of the Queen's Hall in their lives, and who, to judge by the letters pouring into the manager's office inquiring where the melody is published, will probably take an early opportunity of hearing the entire work under symphonic conditions.' Yet the principle of borrowing from high places could be carried to excess. We would not, for instance, like to hear the low comedian chanting his quips, say, to the 'death-knocking-at-the-door' theme in Beethoven's C minor. One of Mr. Glover's opponents was M. Safonoff; but we doubt whether he went to the pantomime.

Much regret will be felt in Manchester that Mr. Egon Petri has decided, after five years' residence in that city, to take up permanent residence in Berlin from next summer. He has long been famous for his recitals of Beethoven's Pianoforte sonatas at the Islington Hall in Ancoats—perhaps the dingiest, dreariest part of industrial Manchester, having for its architectural glories the frowning fronts of mills and workshops. One's imagination is fired by the contemplation of this glorious vision of the mighty Beethoven, played by the pupil of Busoni, right in the heart of this teeming industrial population. How often anywhere can opportunities be found for such an experience as all these sonatas in a few weeks? In the winter of 1908-9, Mr. Petri played them at the University, and then in Ancoats, only omitting the very earliest; the following winter they were all performed in Ancoats in diversified order, and this winter they have been given again in chronological order. And after Christmas followed a series of recitals drawn from Bach and Beethoven's miscellaneous works.

Mr. Petri has been pleasantly outspoken in giving, through the medium of a letter to the Daily News, his reasons for leaving England:

I feel I am born to play the pianoforte, not to teach it, and I have come to the conclusion that I never shall make my way as a pianist as long as I am in Manchester.

Why this should be so I do not know; but the fact is there, nobody will engage you as long as you hold a provincial post. The circle of towns where I played has become smaller and smaller during those five years, till now I play merely in Manchester and suburbs—becoming a sort of local slum-pianist. In England they do not want me, because I am in England; on the Continent they do not want me either—also because I am in England.

I have no appointment in view, and, for all I know, I may be selling matches or grinding an organ in the streets of Berlin next winter. But even so, I shall risk it. Berlin is the town where a pianist has a chance—it is also the town where I have friends, and my best friend, Busoni.

And then I may get on. They may even engage me in Liverpool or London, which they have not done a single time in the last five years, as, for concert-agents, the distance between Liverpool and Berlin is smaller than the distance between Liverpool and Manchester.

He adds that he has no ill-feeling either against the College or against Manchester.

The Beecham opera season came to an end in December. We have heard nothing definite as to the future, but Mr. Beecham has been complaining somewhat bitterly of the lack of support which met his bold enterprise. There is much to be said upon the questions raised by the financial failure of the great experiment. We think there were some extenuating circumstances that could be urged on behalf of the public to account for their attitude. But whatever the cause, there can be only one feeling with regard to Mr. Beecham. He has lavishly poured forth money and energy, has won for himself a great position as an operatic conductor, and has earned the admiration and gratitude of those who were able to witness his many remarkable productions of old and new works. Now his insatiable taste for opera-giving enters a new phase. He has undertaken to produce, at the Palladium, with his own company, abbreviated versions of popular grand operas and to conduct in person, at least on the opening night. By the time this appears in print the season will have started, and its artistic value, which promises to be high, will be known.

A meeting to further the objects of the International Musical Congress (London, May 29 to June 3) will be held at the Mansion House on Wednesday, February 15, at 12 o'clock noon. The Lord Mayor will preside. The Rt. Hon. A. J. Balfour, M.P., has promised to speak.

THE CHAPEL ROYAL, WINDSOR, UNDER KING HENRY V.

By W. H. GRATTAN FLOOD.

The English Chapel Royal was founded by King Edward III. on August 6, 1348, and the foundation was confirmed by letters patent, dated October 26, 1351, being also heavily indulgenced by Pope Clement VI. in the same year. It was erected for twenty-four priests, one of whom was to be Dean, and twenty-four poor knights; and the chapel was exempt from episcopal jurisdiction. William Mugge, the first Dean, was promoted to a prebend in Lichfield Cathedral. His successor, in 1390, was Thomas Butler, an Irishman of the noble house of Ormond, who was appointed Prior of the Knights Hospitallers of Ireland in 1408, whereupon Richard Kyngston was named Dean of Windsor.

On May 29, 1409, King Henry IV. granted in mortmain to the dean and canons of the Chapel Royal, Windsor, a vacant plot, within the Castle called 'Wodehaw,' by the great hall, whereon to build 'houses and chambers for their Vicars, Clerks, Choristers and servants.' On October 8 following, the King granted for life to Richard Kyngston, Dean of the Chapel Royal, 'a house and a mill and a kitchen within Windsor Castle,' at a rent of twenty shillings yearly. On November 29, 1410, the dean and canons were licensed 'to take stones and other necessities for the repair of the chapel and the houses of the canons'; and on the following December 13 one of the canons, William Gillot, was appointed to collect funds for the same object. From all this it is evident that choral services were royally provided for in the Chapel Royal even before the reign of King Henry V.

As far as I am aware, none of our musical historians, in dealing with the reign of Henry V., have noticed the interesting fact that as a boy he had accompanied King Richard II. to Ireland in 1399, and was knighted in Dublin. The young prince was captivated with the strains of the Irish harp—so lauded by Dante, as Galilei writes—and henceforth he became an enthusiastic votary of the clairseach. On the occasion of his coronation in Westminster Hall on April 3, 1413, harps were largely in evidence; and it is recorded by Thomas of Elmham that 'the sweet strings' of the minstrels' harps 'soothed the souls of the guests by their soft melody.' His chief minstrel, William Halyday, was granted for life an annuity of £20 13s. 4d., by privy seal dated August 28, 1413.

It is admitted that King Henry V. was a patron and lover of music, and he kept up the musical services in the Chapel Royal as became a royal musician, also availing himself freely of the developments of musical art. He brought his chapel with him to France in 1415, headed by Robert Gilbert, the Dean, and including such musicians as Simon Marchford (Rector of Harrow), Thomas Woodford, Gerard of Hesse (Yorkshire), Thomas of Hanley, and William Lochart. We read of the royal singers pealing forth Anthems and Te Deums for the great victory of Agincourt on October 25, 1415; and as the choristers proceeded with the chanting of the beautiful Psalm In exitu Israel de Aegypto, Holinshed tells us that the King 'commanded every man to kneel down on the ground at the verse Non nobis, Domine, non nobis, sed nomini Tuo da gloriam, which done, he caused Te Deum, with certain anthems, to be sung.'

The Agincourt anthem is well known to students of English music, and three versions, or variants, of the music score still survive. However, it may not be inappropriate to quote the last verse of the 'Song':

Now gracious God he save our King,
His people, and all his well willing;
Give him good life, and good ending,
That we with mirth may safely sing,
Deo Gratias, Anglia, redde pro victoria.

William Hardgrove was appointed Verger of the Chapel Royal on November 28, 1415, with residence within the Castle of Windsor, 'with the keeping of the mantles of the Knights of the Garter, to bear the rod before the King and his heirs in processions on festival days.' A couple of months later (February 5, 1416) the King granted the Dean and Canons that they should be quit of tenths, fifteenths, or other quota or tallages, whether agreed to by the clergy or imposed by the Sovereign Pontiff; and he also gave his chapel many privileges.

At the celebration of the Feast of Pentecost (Whit-Sunday), in 1416, Henry V. had as his royal guests the Emperor and the Duke of Holland, and to give éclat to the banquet he had all of his minstrels—sixteen in number—present, who received rich gowns for their performance.

Robert Gilbert,* Dean, and the Windsor singers also accompanied King Henry to France in 1417. On the Feast of the Resurrection (Easter Sunday) of the following year, the English monarch had not only his chapel choir to render the sacred music, but at the evening banquet he had a band as well as his minstrels and trumpeters. Nor must it be forgotten that a band of Irish minstrels also discoursed martial music in the campaign of 1418, for we have it on unquestioned authority that Irish pipers accompanied Thomas Butler, Prior of the Knights Hospitalers of Ireland, and fought at Harfleur on September 25, 1418. Butler, as has been previously stated, was formerly Dean of the Chapel Royal and Chancellor of Ireland, and he responded to the appeal of the King by heading in person 1,500 Irish and Anglo-Irish troops, whose prowess has been celebrated in the historical poem on the siege of Rouen by John Page, who was himself present. It is only pertinent to add that this martial prior died during the siege of Rouen on August 10, 1419.

After the surrender of Rouen, on January 19, 1420, Henry V. entered the city in triumph, and being a pious monarch he at once paid a thanksgiving visit to the Cathedral, where his Chapel Royal singers were in waiting, with Dean Gilbert at their head. This memorable incident is chronicled for us by John Page, who thus writes of the victorious English king:

His Chappelle met him at the door,
And went before him on the floor,
And songe a Respond glorius
That is named Quis est magnus?

It is very probable that the Chapel Royal choristers assisted at the King's marriage to Princess Katherine of Valois, at the Cathedral of Troyes, on the Feast of the Holy Trinity, June 2, 1420. One thing is certain, that the English monarch at this date kept up his practice on the harp, and induced his young Queen to cultivate the instrument. In October, 1420, he procured a harp for Queen Katherine, and as became a royal patron of British made musical instruments, he sent the order to a London maker. Nor are we left in doubt as to the manufacturer, for in the Issue Rolls of the Exchequer there is an entry of payment of £8 13s. 4d. to William Merston, for two new harps purchased for King Henry and Queen Katherine, manufactured by John Bore, of London, harp-maker.

Nor even in his last hours did King Henry V. forget his minstrels. He died on August 31, 1422, and left an injunction that an annuity of one hundred shillings was to be paid to each of his minstrels—which was accordingly done. In regard to the Chapel Royal he laid the foundations of a glorious musical tradition, but it was reserved for his son and successor, Henry VI., to make the dean and canons a corporate body, and to create the position of 'Master of the Song' in favour of a separate lay official, Master John Plummer, who is still commemorated on every 'Obit Sunday' at St. George's Chapel, Windsor, as 'at the head of those who also are held in grateful remembrance.' This John Plummer was made first Master of the Song on September 29, 1444, at an annual salary of forty marks, for the training of eight choristers, or singing boys. It were ungracious not to add that the present distinguished organist, Sir Walter Parratt, M.V.O., worthily upholds the high reputation of the musical services, the foundations of which were laid during the reign of Henry V.

WAGNER AS A HUMANITARIAN.

By D. C. PARKER.

The typical genius of the revolutionary type is seldom a lovable person. He makes such demands upon his nerves, he works with such a fevered brain, that irritation is stamped upon many of his actions and impatience written large across the chronicle of his daily life. He sees a goal; it is to reach it that he strives and spends his enormous energies, and in his determination and zest to accomplish his life's task he is often none too scrupulous of the feelings and rights of others. He has his feet upon the skull of the booby who was rash enough to cross his path, and in countless little ways he pays for his inborn gifts by a total lack of sympathy and compassion. To many of his contemporaries Nietzsche, with his wild countenance and fierce drooping moustaches, must have appeared as something akin to a human engine without a safety-valve. The man of singular strength of purpose and inflexibility of will power is wont to cry with Brand 'All or Nothing!' and sometimes the avalanche makes the last sad scene a pitiful sight for gods and men.

Although Wagner was a progressivist and wrought a revolution in music, he possessed a many-sided personality not usual with the Berserker, Ja-sager, Übermensch of our imagination. Much was written against him during his lifetime, and he doubtless caused many sores, for he went out with a heavy hand against the Philistines and Vandals. But even his contemporaries must have seen that the sensitive boy developed into a sympathetic man; that beneath the proud exterior, behind the imperial figure, there was one who naturally took the side of the weak and down-trodden in vital questions. To some it may have appeared that this was a redeeming quality in an otherwise impossibly complex nature, something not unlike the love of Shylock for his Jessica. That Wagner felt keenly and thought deeply on many questions affecting the welfare of mankind is evinced by numberless incidents which occurred during a crowded and energetic life.

The first indication of Wagner's sympathy with the members of the animal kingdom is to be found in the story of his boyhood. In spite of a restless energy which, judged from the labours of his later years, seems thoroughly characteristic, he showed a quite unusual love of nature and of animals. It is not difficult to imagine with what glee the youthful and impressionable stripling skipped into the green fields of the country, and we can readily understand to how great an extent they thrilled the child who was later to create such unforgettable pictures of old Nuremberg, with its shaded streets and spring blossoms. But Wagner's love of nature was not greater than his love for animals. As a boy he was the friend of dogs, and was ever ready to make friends of them. One of these companions, named Robber, a noble Newfoundland, whom he had come across at Riga, played an important part in the composer's life. When the whole world was against him he turned to it and there found the sympathy and trust which many of his fellows withheld. It accompanied him and his wife on that eventful and stormy voyage during which he heard from sailor's lips the fascinating tale of the cursed Vanderdecken. Robber is ensured of immortality through being mentioned in the pamphlet entitled 'Eine Ende in Paris.' During the composer's residence in Magdeburg he was constantly attended by another dog named Rüpel, and in later years his Marke was inseparable from him. Had Wagner left us the projected 'History of my dogs' we should doubtless have found it a very interesting document, as his love for them was very great. This was not a pose. It was not like the attitude of Baudelaire towards cats, to whom he dedicated poems, nor yet like the foolish freaks of fancy which cause an actress to befriend a crocodile. It was rather a joy in their presence and an understanding of their natural sagacity which could only have sprung from a deep-rooted knowledge of their life and habits.

Wagner's splendid appreciation of the immense value of life gives one the key to a good understanding of his nature. There is something broad and full-blooded in his cosmic outlook. Just as in his sympathy with animals he is at one with Schopenhauer, so in his attitude to life he is largely at one with Buddha. His studies in philosophy and religion brought him face to face with the personal expression of the best minds both of East and West. With a great number of the utterances left by the sages of the Orient he was in entire agreement. He relished particularly the sayings of the Persian poet Hafiz. In the course of his excursions among these books of wisdom, and during his researches into the legends and lore so closely interwoven with them, he found opinions which he had formed previously on his own account. In thus finding his views confirmed by acknowledged leaders of the world's thought, he must have experienced no small pleasure. Whether this be so or not it is quite certain that he held views on the sanctity of life which are not commonly found among those who constitute the cultured life of Europe. In his school days, along with several companions, he paid a visit to a slaughter-house. There he saw an ox killed, and the action produced such a revulsion of feeling that he did not easily forget the incident. Indeed, so greatly did the sight repel him that for some time afterwards he did not eat meat. This episode reminds us of the theory which he expounded later in his life when he declared that the meat-eating man was a slaughterer of animals, and that meat-eating had been largely responsible for man's physical degeneration. To one holding such views the chamois hunter and the sportsman with gun in hand are robbed of all their heroism. Once only did Wagner figure in a hunting party, and this was when he made a visit to an acquaintance named Kittle. In a moment of excitement he fired a shot and witnessed the result of it later in the appearance of a wounded hare. The sight of the creature, full of the eloquence of dumb pain, was never entirely obliterated from his memory. Here was an experience akin to that which we find in his early opera 'Die Feen.' The hero, Arindal, has shot a hind. 'The beast can weep,' he cries, 'a tear-drop glistens in its eye.' To the man who does not think on such subjects seriously, all this seems very squeamish, but Wagner is to be numbered among those whose sensitive natures revolt at cruelty of whatever kind it be. There are men like Tolstoi, Prince Kropotkin and Verestchagin, whose lives have been one cry of anguish at man's inhumanity to man. The conditions which existed in the theatre of their actions called forth a protest from them, for they were single-minded enough to see the barbarism and futility of cruelty and hate. They therefore sought to condemn the Grand Inquisitor and to abolish the Cossack's lash. They saw that man's selfishness and hypocrisy were responsible for many a hideous episode in the world's history, and that men sought to justify those very actions which brought such tribulation in their wake. If the Maiden of Nuremberg be now but the relic of a brutal past, there yet remains much unnecessary pain and suffering in the world. To many, with its claims of progress and goodwill ringing in their ears, it seems as though the world were uttering a lie, for there exist those who, with Aves upon their lips, slaughter humanity from throat to buttock. Wagner's large heart caused him to sympathise with the suffering. Wherever there was pain his feelings went forth in a flood of disinterested and generous emotion. He had some hard words for warlike peoples whose success with the sword gave them that smug sense of self-complacency which was so bitterly ridiculed by Nietzsche in his essay on David Strauss.

If further evidence were required of Wagner's attitude towards such questions, one could point to his pamphlet 'Über die Vivisektion,' which dates from 1879. Herein he proclaims himself a thorough-going humanitarian. He denounces vivisection as a false utilitarianism. It is from the animals that man acquires a knowledge of himself and his own place in the universe. So great was Wagner the musician, so momentous was the change which he wrought in the world of opera, that his historical importance as a composer has overshadowed the tremendous activity which he exerted in other directions. If Wagner the philosopher and poet is not to be taken too seriously, there yet remains Wagner the humanitarian, and a study of this aspect of a versatile personality yields much good fruit. It was the humanity of Wagner which gave us 'Die Meistersinger,' and technically great as that work is in a hundred ways, it is yet infinitely greater in its human impulses. Here his own laughter, 'broad as ten thousand beeves at pasture,' as Meredith has it, is heard in every page of the score, and it is a laughter such as Franz Hals would have delighted to paint—a laughter more kindly to human hearts than the waggish chuckle of the incorrigible Till of Brunswick. The work overflows with the infectious gemüthlichkeit of the homely Hans Sachs, and the power of characterization displayed is indeed extraordinary. From Eva, Sachs and Walther of Stolzing, to the delightful thumb-nail sketch of that intensely lovable and mediæval figure, the night-watchman, it is all the work not only of a great artist but of a great man. He gives us pictures of the town in different garb—a church in the morning, a street fight at night, a festival in the coloured fields, and all because this meant so much to him. He paints the obstreperous apprentice with as much care as the sleepy burgher: for to the man interested in life, alleys and taverns have their tales to tell, and petty pedlars who bolt their doors and wear their nightcaps early have a humour and philosophy of their own. And so all those old masters live and breathe again. It was the human Wagner that made this possible, the man whose soul was quick where human interests were at stake. Great was the composer's consciousness of man's responsibility in vital things, and he approached such a subject as vivisection with all the thoroughness and seriousness which only a German can command. This activity exhibits him in yet another rôle, and we seem to see him often as one whose desire it was 'Never to blend our pleasure or our pride

With sorrow of the meanest thing that feels.'

MUSIC IN VILLAGE CHURCHES.

An address having the above as its text was recently given by Mr. C. Lee Williams at the Shire Hall, Gloucester. Mr. Williams took the line, urged by so many, that far too much is attempted by village choirs, and that a choral service on cathedral lines too often leads to failure on their part, and complaint, more or less justified, by the congregation. We presume Mr. Williams would allow the use of simple settings of the Canticles and short and easy anthems, but the fact is there is great difficulty in choosing music which combines simplicity with fitness and good musicianship, though he claims a larger selection than we should have thought existed. We have looked through several hundred examples, and have found so many which are merely a collection of well-worn idioms, wearisome by their familiarity. Most people who sit down to write a service do so with the intention of putting all their strength into elaboration of detail. If we could prevail upon our best writers really to invent a style of service-music in which the vocal part is well within the powers of a country choir, and to add an interesting and varied organ-part, the result would be, with our improved instruments and the progress of the art of organ-playing now so much in evidence, an advance in the cause of church music. We do not say that nothing worthy of its high purpose has yet been written, but that from its very rarity those in charge of village choirs fly at once to music far above their powers. Mr. Williams deplores (and we heartily agree with him) the spectacle of a village choir wrestling with a so-called cathedral service, though, from what we have already said, we cannot think as he does that 'settings of the Canticles and the Creed are entirely out of place in a village church.' He admits later that, though 'the bulk of the country people . . . would like to join, and are capable of joining, in the services themselves [?], and do not want to have it sung for them in elaborate and impossible settings, they generally understand that the choir, in which some of them very likely take an interest, has an undoubted right to be heard alone if the settings are simple.' It is a subject of which we can never hope to hear a satisfactory solution. That the hymn is the peculiar property of the congregation there can, however, be no question, and our experience agrees with that of Mr. Williams that the stately old hymns of a chorale type, sung slowly in unison in a low key suitable for all voices, are most inspiring. As to the settings of the Kyrie, we agree that the choice too often falls upon those of which simplicity and congregational fitness are not strong features. The response is a humble supplication, and should be within the capacity of all present. Many of our well-known settings are quite unsuitable, even for well-trained choirs. Strict adherence to modal harmony with the simplest melodic treatment is best, while the compass of the treble part should be within easy reach. Mr. Williams rightly deprecated the singing at a high pitch of Tallis's Festival responses. His plea for reverting 'to the simple old inflexions in unison which everyone knows' has some justification, and we presume he alludes to the Ferial setting, where, however, mutilation has done its work, the subject needing revision and the adoption of uniformity.

As to the fear that simple chants, hymns and an anthem will not keep a choir together very long, we can only say that this is, if true, a proof that the choir take a wrong view of their work. The fact must be met, however, and Mr. Williams's plan seems to us a good one. He says, 'Why not hold your weekly practice in the school . . . and devote half the allotted time to a little secular music?' He also adds that the practice of such music, especially if unaccompanied, 'has a most wholesome educational value.' Also that 'it is the incessant pounding away on the organ, harmonium, or pianoforte, that is the ruin of half the choirs in the country.'

There is no doubt that, in the many cases where there is difficulty in obtaining boys, much may be done with young girls' voices, and Mr. Williams gives examples from his own observation where the happiest results have been obtained by these means. He quite rightly points to the extraordinary success obtained by girls' voices in the many musical competitions in this country as strong support of his contention.

In conclusion, the subject is, we think, one of which it is difficult to over-estimate the importance, and such papers as that read by Mr. Williams must prove helpful and encouraging to those whose burden is the onerous and often disheartening work of training village choirs.

THE EVOLUTION OF THE ADULT MALE VOICE.

By E. DAVIDSON PALMER.

The evolution of the adult male voice is one of nature's secrets. It seems strange that in this age of exhaustive scientific investigation, when the workings of nature in other directions are so well understood, the process of development by which the boy is enabled to secure a good voice in manhood should remain a mystery and an enigma. Yet it is a fact, and one about which there is little or no dispute. We have most of us noticed at one time or another how capriciously nature seems to act in this matter.

How often do we see the gift of a fine tenor voice thrown away upon a man who not only does not know a note of music but who cannot be got to take the trouble to learn! On the other hand, how seldom do we find that the man of decided musical proclivities is favoured by nature in this way! It does happen occasionally, and then we have the material for a great singer. But in most cases the talent is bestowed upon one man and the voice upon another.

But what is perhaps more remarkable still, is the way in which nature deals with the voice of the boy-singer at and after the changing period. And this is the point on which I wish particularly to dwell. We might reasonably expect to find that an exceptionally fine voice in boyhood would, as a general rule, be the precursor of an exceptionally fine voice in manhood. But we all know that this is not the case. It is a matter of common observation that the boys in our cathedral choirs—boys who have been specially selected from all parts of the country on account of the superior quality of their voices—are not the stock from which our leading men-singers are derived. In the great majority of cases, after the changing period has come and gone, although they often make their mark as musicians, we hear no more of them as singers. The supply of tenors and basses for professional purposes is drawn from quite a different source. With very few exceptions these singers are men who, in boyhood, if they sang at all, sang but very little, and only in a desultory way.

It is sometimes argued that the reason choir-boys do not become singers in after life is that they sing too much in boyhood, and especially that they continue singing until too near the age of puberty—a time when it is generally believed that the singing voice requires complete rest. There is much force in this argument, and it might perhaps be accepted as a fairly satisfactory explanation of the matter, were it not for one curious fact, viz., that while it is perfectly true, as a general rule, that nature obtains the material for her best men-singers from those who have not been singers in boyhood, she occasionally acts in quite the contrary way, and bestows a voice of phenomenal excellence upon a man who has not only sung much in childhood, but has continued to sing right through the changing period. I do not know whether it has ever happened in the case of a bass singer, but there is more than one instance on record in which a fine tenor voice has been obtained in this way. One of our most popular operatic tenors has testified to the fact as exemplified in his own voice, and this is how he describes the development-process: 'My voice never broke; it gradually lowered in pitch from soprano to contralto, and then changed almost imperceptibly into the tenor quality.'

Now what is the real meaning of these puzzling phenomena? Of course it goes without saying, that while nature may appear to be acting in an arbitrary and capricious manner, in reality she is doing nothing of the kind. She is simply doing her best to furnish us with a clue to the secret of her modus operandi. And if we would only rid our minds of preconceived notions, and so prepare ourselves to profit by the hints which she from time to time throws out, we should, I think, have little difficulty in finding the clue that is needed. Is it not distinctly discernible in the statement of the tenor singer above referred to? The point to be noted is that the singer in question continued to employ in manhood, as well as during the period of adolescence, the same mode of production as he had used in boyhood. How many choir-boys do this? Probably not one in a hundred; perhaps not one in a thousand. When the changing period arrives they find that, by a mode of production which may have been already employed by some of them for a few notes at the bottom of their compass, but which to many of them is altogether new, they are enabled to obtain what to them appears to be the true, manly quality of tone; and consequently, with the natural eagerness of youth to rush into manhood as soon as possible, the great majority of them adopt this mode of production forthwith, while that which they had previously employed for either the whole or the greater part of their voice they put aside as being of no further use to them. We know the result. The choir-boy's voice, however good it may have been in his early years, proves as a rule of very little value in after life.

Have we not here a clear case of cause and effect? When at the approach of manhood the original mode of production is changed the consequences are unmistakably harmful; when it is persisted in they are in the highest degree beneficial. It is of course impossible to reconcile this conclusion with the commonly accepted view regarding the adult male voice, but it is nevertheless strikingly confirmed by evidence of another kind. It has already been said that the men who have the best voices are, generally speaking, those who have not been singers in boyhood. If we question these men about their voices, we find that they have no recollection of any breaking period such as the ordinary choir-boy, in common with many other boys, goes through. On the contrary, as far as their memory serves them there was no noticeable change at this critical time. The voice of the boy simply merged gradually and imperceptibly into that of the man; and their impression, often amounting to a decided conviction, is that they are producing it now, and have been ever since the changing period passed away, in precisely the same way as they were doing before that period began.

There is not space to pursue the matter further in the present article, but what I have written will perhaps be sufficient to stimulate inquiry into a subject regarding which investigation is greatly needed.

AN ORGAN THAT TOOK OVER TWENTY YEARS TO BUILD.

Deep in the wilds of Worcestershire, ten miles from 'everywhere,' lies the peaceful village of Dormstone, approached by winding lanes through avenues of trees, past picturesque farmhouses with curious old dovecotes. In journeying to one of these farmhouses for a holiday I heard of the home-made organ about to be described.

I was told that a cottager at Flyford-Flavell had built himself an organ, and my curiosity being aroused I arranged to visit the village. I found the 'organ builder' in his garden planting cabbage seed. He is a typical country labourer, his short, thick-set figure being much bent by years of toil. After I had explained my mission, William Simmons—that is his name—asked me into his cottage to see and examine his wonderful organ. I did not know that the organ I was about to see was a pipe-organ, so imagine my surprise when I saw a great collection of pipes reaching to the ceiling of the cottage!

'However did you make this?' I asked. 'With a shut-knife, old razor, an' a saw,' was the justly proud reply. 'I suppose you were a long time making it?' I queried. 'Yes,' replied the old man, 'above twenty years. I had to do it at odd times after my day's work.'

The case of the organ is 7 feet high by 5 feet 6 inches wide, and is made of oak and deal. It is stained and varnished. The 'fretwork' front—I say 'fretwork' because the laths are full of small round holes (these holes were marked out by drawing a pencil around a halfpenny—is made in small sections, and can be removed when a greater volume of sound is required.

The organ has one manual, the compass of which is about four and a quarter octaves (C to E). The keys are made of polished boxwood. There are 309 square wood pipes which provide five different qualities of tone. Five stops are placed at the left side of the organ. Commencing from the lowest there is the Open Diapason. Next comes the Stopped Diapason. The first nine semitones of the bottom octave run on the same pipes as the Open Diapason, so that forty-four pipes are given to this stop instead of fifty-three. Next comes the Principal. These are stopped pipes throughout.

The next stop was a great surprise. It is a 'combination of the 15th and 16th.' The 16th gives an octave above the 15th. The pipes of the 15th are stopped, whilst those of the 16th are open. The fifth stop is the Flute, and when one remembers that all the pipes are made of wood and in tune, one cannot possibly imagine the vast amount of patience exercised by Mr. Simmons in getting this degree of perfection.

On the right-hand side of the keyboard is a shaft for blowing. The 'blowing' part consists of double bellows, square feeding-box, and bellows-escape. A lead weight attached to a cord shows when the bellows are full or empty. This weight, together with candelabras made out of old brass candlesticks, are the only visible signs of metal. The music-desk is not a fixture, but can be used as a table-stand. I learned that the old man had been a member of the 'Village carol singers' and played the double-bass, so probably the desk was made to answer both purposes. An old table-drawer, in which there is a pile of manuscript written by Mr. Simmons from time to time, fills the space between the pipes and the keyboard.

After my examination of the organ, the clever old man turned to me and said: 'I knows yer plays, and I should loike to 'ear yer get some music out of 'im.' I explained that the violin was my instrument and that the organ was secondary; but the 'organ-builder' insisted upon my playing 'something.' I sat upon the stool, and immediately Mrs. Simmons was called to 'blow,' the old man remarking: 'This is one of the "we" uns. Yer 'as to say "we" when yer talk o' playing this 'ere organ.' I had been improvising upon the instrument for a few minutes when the old man, who was standing in the doorway of the cottage, shouted: 'Master Phillips, let's 'ave summat big.' I at once commenced playing a prelude and fugue of Bach's, at the conclusion of which Mr. Simmons came to the stool, placed his hand upon my shoulder, and with his eyes sparkling with pride, said: 'Master Phillips, ye've got a lot o' music out on 'im, but ther's sich a lot left in 'im yer.'

I then turned my attention to the maker of this wonderful instrument, and from questions put I found that William Simmons was born sixty-five years ago at Stoulton, a small parish four miles north-west of Pershore. He had little or no education, and commenced work on a farm at the age of seven, earning three-halfpence a day. Four years later he started as a 'roadman,' and worked under the Worcester Turnpike Trust until it was abolished. He afterwards worked for the Upton Snodsbury Highway Board until that also was abolished. He is now working for the Pershore Rural District Council, and with a knowing wink the old man added, 'An' I 'ope to work for 'em until they be abolished.' He persevered with music 'on his own account,' and held several posts as organist. He was organist at the Parish Church, White Ladies, Aston, for four years; Himbleton Parish Church for four years; Parish Church, Flyford-

Flavell, for two years; and Upton Snodsbury Parish Church for sixteen years. During this sixteen years Mr. Simmons only missed three services, and those through illness. The church is three miles from his cottage, and after walking to and from the church twice a week, the organist received the handsome sum of £6 per year.

Mr. Simmons has not only succeeded in playing and building an organ, but he is the composer of not a few chants and hymn-tunes. Forty-three years ago he married Sarah Ann Houghton, at Peopleton, and has had eleven children—six daughters and five sons. Nine of these are still living.

'Plum Tree Cottage,' the home of Mr. and Mrs. Simmons, is in the parish of Flyford-Flavell, nine miles east of Worcester. It is called 'Plum Tree Cottage' for the remarkable fact that a prolific plum tree has its root inside the building, its branches protruding through the walls of the dwelling-place. The 'organ builder' and his wife have lived in this cottage for thirty-seven years.

At my request the old man seated himself at the organ, and with the assistance of Mrs. Simmons sang and played 'How beautiful upon the mountains.' I was very much surprised at the quality of tone of the organ. It is mellow, full, and of considerable volume. In fact the whole piece of work is so clever that I took my farewell of the genius with one haunting thought: 'What would this man have achieved with the advantages of a thorough musical education, combined with a thorough training in the art of organ building?'

WELSH MUSIC FROM AN ENGLISH POINT OF VIEW.

BY FRANK KIDSON.

It is particularly unfortunate that Welsh musical history has, from 1742, for a century or more onward, been in the hands of editors unqualified by reason of a mistaken patriotism and by lack of knowledge for so important a function. Their accounts of the national music of Wales have, equally unfortunately, been accepted and repeated, as well as faultily enhanced, by many subsequent writers equally unfitted for the task. The native of the Principality who has grown up in this, is therefore naturally inclined to resent, as an attack upon 'gallant little Wales,' any attempt to set things right. The antiquary, musical or otherwise, who allows patriotism to interfere with his just balance of facts, is a harmful and pernicious person.

It is refreshing to see that such men as Dr. Lloyd Williams and Mr. Emlyn Evans have taken a saner view of Welsh national music than others. They have accepted the fact that an abnormal antiquity cannot be assigned to all existing Welsh airs, and, with others, they have made an attempt, by the formation of the Welsh Folk-song Society, to gather together really Welsh music.

It is only from those who are prepared to seek out facts and to draw logical conclusions, without reference to national bias, that we can hope for anything like a satisfactory account of a particular nation's music.

Since 1784 and 1794, when Edward Jones wrote largely of Welsh musical matters, the technique of historical research has changed. We no longer work in the unscientific methods of a century ago. We seek light from a wider circle of facts.

It was William Chappell, who, in an obscure footnote of small type ('Popular Music,' old edition, p. 64), drew brief attention to the errors of Welsh editors; although in a like manner certain myths regarding the antiquity of Welsh music were exposed, and exploded, in a Welsh historical journal published in 1863-64, 'Cerdor Cymreig.' Yet this was in the Welsh language, and it had not the slightest effect in checking the absurd conclusions of Welsh editors. In fact, it was not until the publication of a paper read by Dr. Lloyd Williams, in January, 1908, that anything like a sane view was publicly expressed on the subject in the English language.

In the Musical Times for November, 1910, Mr. Emlyn Evans offered some criticism on the article 'Welsh Music' in the new 'Grove.' He very properly says that priority of publication does not necessarily carry with it proof of nationality.

The new article in 'Grove' does not follow such line of argument, but it points out, with great reason, that the Welsh editors were either entirely ignorant or did wilfully shut their ears to obvious facts. For example, it is pretty obvious that such Welsh tunes which have been noted traditionally, bearing corrupted titles of the originals published a century or so before in the ordinary course as English, are merely oral remembrances of these originals. There are a great many examples of this class. There is Richard Roberts's 'King's joy,' printed in 1829 as 'never before published,' which turns out to be the cavalier song, 'When the King shall enjoy his own again,' 1652.

There is 'The monks' march,' printed by Jones in 1784, with the remark that this was 'probably' the tune of the Monks of Bangor, when they marched to Chester in 603. This 'probability' became a certainty with later editors, and it was boldly called 'The monks of Bangor's march.' George Thomson even got Sir Walter Scott to write a poem for the air dealing with the massacre of the unfortunate monks. And so the romantic feeling grew. A reference to Playford's 'Dancing Master,' vol. ii., 1719, reveals the same tune printed by Jones, both the slow and the quick parts, practically note for note, under the title, 'Monk's march with the wanders.' That this refers to General Monk, created Duke of Albemarle, is proved by the tune appearing at the end of the 1665 edition of the 'Dancing Master' as 'The L. Monk's march.' In this copy the quick part is not present, which is sufficient to show that Jones's source was the later version of it. To show how little change has been made, the 1665 copy and the first part of Jones's, 1784, may be given:

THE L. MONK'S MARCH.

From 'The Dancing Master,' 1665.

THE MONK'S MARCH.

Ymdaith Mwng.

From Jones's 1784 and 1794.

A quick movement follows this, which also occurs following the same tune in the 'Dancing Master,' 1719.

Another Welsh claim is for the air 'The First of August,' which originally came into notice about the beginning of the 18th century by reason of a party of Swedish tumblers or dancers using it. It then appeared as 'The New Swedish Dance,' and after a varied career took the title 'The First of August' or 'The Glorious First of August,' from a song in praise of the Hanoverian succession. Details of all this will be found in an article by myself in the Musical Times of September, 1895. Without any mention of its previous English and Scottish associations, Jones, in 1802, speaks of it in connection with the payment of Welsh tithes, and a note about the observance of Llammas day, to account for its title translated into Welsh. And so we may go on, merely taking those tunes that have corrupted English titles.

Even so late as 1896 there is an example in Mr. Benner's collection of traditional Welsh airs. We find the mysterious title (with a Welsh equivalent), 'Barley shot.' On turning to this air we discover that it is the old Scottish song tune 'O gin' I were fairly shut of her,' which in most early collections of dance music is abbreviated into 'Fairly shut' or 'Fairly shut of her' (see Walsh's 'Caledonian Country Dances,' c. 1750, and elsewhere). This is something on a par with the old tune called 'Paddy's resource,' being turned into 'Paddy's racehorse,' though this is not a Welsh editor's slip.

There is another point to note as an example of criminal editorship. In Bremner's 'Harpsichord and Spinnet Miscellany,' published at Edinburgh (as a contemporary advertisement proves) in 1761, there is a lesson named 'Cibel,' and a Cibel is, of course, an obsolete dance measure. Jones, in 1784 and again in 1794, boldly takes it from Bremner, bass and treble, and even the turns over certain notes, and transfers it bodily to his 'Relicks of the Welsh Bards,' calling it 'Sibyl,' without a word of comment at his appropriation. The change from 'Cibel' to 'Sibyl' adds a mystic flavour which the mere name of a dance measure would not give.

It is a thankless and a wearisome office to wade through Welsh collections and find so many examples of senseless and needless appropriations. For, be it remembered, Wales can honestly boast of a wealth of national music peculiarly its own, and it is unfortunate that until the establishment of the Welsh Folk-Song Society no serious attempt was made to rescue its fast disappearing remains. It is also an unfortunate thing that editor after editor has been content—in an age when, in other matters, such myths are swept aside—blindly to repeat the wild statements made by the earlier writers. These editors did not seek for such fresh material as already existed in the old country dance books, an indication of which I pointed to in the 'Welsh Folk-Song Journal.'

Mr. Emlyn Evans speaks of the 'characteristics' of Welsh music. What characteristics can we fix upon when so much of the so-called Welsh music is of doubtful origin? I think it may be honestly stated that most, if not all of the tunes mentioned in the new 'Grove' as being doubtful, have few characteristics of the traditional music recently noted from the peasantry, or the many undoubted Welsh melodies in Blind Parry's, Jones's, and some other collections. Then it must be realised that any tune which passes into another country, and remains there merely by tradition, soon gets the national flavour of the music of its resting-place imparted to it.

For example, there is the old tune fitted to the ballad 'Queen Dido,' which commences, 'When Troy town for ten years' war.' The tune is generally assigned as the composition of Dr. John Wilson, as it first appears among his compositions in his 'Cheerful Ayres,' printed at Oxford in 1660, and Playford continues this assignment when he reprints it in his 'Musical Companion,' 1672. Blind Parry prints a copy of 'Queen Dido' as 'Brenhines Dido,' in 1781, and it will be noticed that the second part of the air has got engrafted on to it a decided Welsh flavour. The fine, marked character of the original melody, purely English in style, has given place to another type. There are other instances which might be cited of a like change, due no doubt to a traditional life in Wales, and transference from the voice to general performance on the harp. This may therefore stand against a fixed argument as to 'National characteristics.'

BREHNINES DIDO. (QUEEN DIDO.)

From Parry's 'British Harmony,' 1781.

Mr. Emlyn Evans speaks of the 'Bells of Aberdovey,' and expresses surprise that in the article in the new 'Grove' it should be assigned to Charles Dibdin. He regards the facts that Dibdin put the air forth in 1785 as his own composition, and that it was never inserted in any Welsh collection before 1844, or earlier Welsh claim made for it, as 'negative inferences.' I answer, if a man retains an article for fifty-nine years which he asserts is his own, without a shadow of a claim being made for it, in the interval, the inference is pretty positive on his side. He further queries why it has not been included side by side with songs undoubtedly by Dibdin. If Mr. Evans will examine every moderately complete edition of Dibdin's songs, from that one in five volumes dated 1799 to Davidson's edition issued in 1842, he will find the song side by side with the rest of Dibdin's. But it may be asked, on the other hand, If the air be Welsh, why was it not included in any Welsh collection prior to 1844? Between 1785, when Dibdin first issued it as his own composition, and Miss Williams's collection of 1844, a great number of Welsh collections had been issued—Jones (1794-1802), &c., and several by John Parry and others—men all eager to publish Welsh airs, and 'The bells of Aberdovey' is a delightful one, and yet Welsh editors avoided it.

Whatever inferences may be drawn, negative or positive, the proveable facts are these. In 1785 Dibdin produced an opera at Drury Lane called 'Liberty Hall.' In this opera he introduced a comic character, being a Welshman who speaks a mixture of Welsh and English. This is quite an old 'wheeze'; Shakespeare did it, D'Urfey did it, and a hundred others.

He makes the Welshman sing a song in broken English, interlarded with Welsh words (these, no doubt, obtained from a Welsh friend) relating to the Bells of Aberdovey. The song with music was published in oblong folio by John Preston, in 1785 or 1786, and the title-page, to distinguish the opera from those made up of odds and ends, expressly states that the whole composition is by Mr. Dibdin, thus—'Liberty Hall: or The test of goodfellowship,' a comic opera as performed with universal applause at the Theatre Royal, Drury Lane, being entirely an original composition by Mr. Dibdin.

In 1844, Miss Williams, who had been collecting songs in South Wales, published a version of the air with the sole remark, 'The origin of this air is unknown.' Whether she knew that the air had long been recognized as Dibdin's, or how she obtained it, she does not say, although in regard to her other airs she gives more explicit notes as to where she noted them down.

These are definite facts: the inferences may be made at will. My inference is that Miss Williams's notation is a traditional version, evolved from Dibdin, which she had heard somewhere. As to its Welsh character, Dibdin was sufficiently an artist to make this song sung by his Welshman sufficiently Welsh-like to be in keeping. Did not Hook adopt a Scottish style when he composed 'Within a mile of Edinburgh town'? Does not every composer, when it is desirable, follow a like course?

It is in no sense with a wish to degrade Welsh music that I have penned this, and the article in 'Grove,' but with an earnest desire that some effort should be made to clear the lumber and extraneous matter from the subject. The false conclusions I have spoken of here, and in 'Grove,' are obscurities which cloud, and prevent true light being thrown upon it. It is surely time that Wales should make an authoritative collection of its own melodies, stating their source, and, before admitting doubtful airs, examine the evidence for and against in a dispassionate manner, and without a national bias towards the many which have accidentally become sojourners in the country.

THE PSYCHOLOGY OF BERLIOZ.

BY GERALD CUMBERLAND.

Though more than a century has passed since Berlioz was born, it is doubtful if he is more generally understood to-day than he was three decades ago. His music has never enjoyed real popularity in this country, and though his 'Damnation of Faust' has been given up and down the kingdom times without number, yet any success it has enjoyed and any sporadic enthusiasm it may have elicited, have been due, not to real understanding of the composer's aims, but rather to an appreciation of a few isolated numbers of that extraordinary work. And, truly, Berlioz offers so many peculiar features of mental and moral equipment that he must always remain something of a problem to those who are unwilling to devote their time and patience to the study of his work and character.

Berlioz is most readily comprehended in his prose works. The 'Mémoires' gives us the inner man stripped of everything save his incessant poses; but, as attitudinising was as natural to him as unaffected simplicity is to a dumb animal, no one can possibly be deceived by his posturings. He did not attitudinise for the delectation of les autres, but solely for his own enjoyment. He saw himself as he saw everything that touched either his imagination or his emotions, and in his own eyes he was a figure of colossal proportions.

All the mental and moral qualities and defects that make his 'Lettres Intimes,' his 'Mémoires' and his 'A travers Chants' so irresistibly fascinating are to be found in his compositions: to understand the former is to grasp the meaning and the full significance of the latter.

It is one of the peculiar and altogether charming traits of humanity that the habitual boaster, given to exaggeration as he always is, soon comes to believe in his own inventions: when he has said a thing three times, it is true. It was so with Berlioz. No one will ever be able to separate the true from the false in his 'Mémoires'; the whole work is, in fact, a romance, and the romance consists in heightening commonplace circumstance out of all recognition by suffusing it with volcanic emotion, and by presenting it in the glamour of lime-light. But lime-light never deceives, and neither does Berlioz; for, though we cannot know precisely when he is romancing, yet we are instinctively put on our guard by the intense tones of his voice, and we end by discounting every adventure he chooses to relate.

His 'Mémoires' begins quietly enough, but when we have turned over a few pages we begin to detect the workings of the artist-mind. Almost imperceptibly the narrative strengthens and becomes hot; suddenly, it reaches boiling point, and we come to l'affaire Smithson. 'I have now come to the grand drama of my life.' That is how Chapter 18 opens, and very soon we realise that we are intended to view the whole business as a primeval spectacle. Men fall in love every day, but not à la Berlioz: he is apart, remote, august. He sees Miss Smithson act Shakespeare at the Odéon, and he declares, hand on heart, that it 'would take a great physiologist adequately to describe the nervous state' into which he was thrown. That is the authentic Berlioz. Later on, he goes to a rehearsal of 'Romeo and Juliet,' and, entering the theatre at the moment when Romeo carries Juliet off the stage in his arms, gives 'a loud cry' and rushes out of the theatre, 'wildly wringing my hands. Juliet had seen and heard me. . . . I had frightened her, and she asked the men who were with her to watch me, as she did not like the look of my eyes.' The italics, of course, belong to Berlioz: he could not resist them. When, on the succeeding page, Miss Smithson leaves Paris, we are told that 'no words can describe what I suffered; even Shakespeare has never painted the horrible gnawing at the heart, the sense of utter desolation, the worthlessness of life, the torture of one's throbbing pulses,' &c., &c. This is in the grand manner: it is the manner of Berlioz. When we remember that at this time the musician had never exchanged a single word with his beloved, that she was not even aware of his existence, that he made no attempt to be introduced to her, and that this intense account of his feelings was written nearly twenty years after the events he describes, one doubts the veracity of the man whilst applauding the superb art of the writer.

But one love was not enough for Berlioz. With his thoughts still 'veiled in crape' (it was in the height of the Byronic fever), he fell in love with an anonymous lady, a teacher of the pianoforte, and for reasons unknown (if they ever existed) he executed a superb piece of tragedy-comedy. He was in Rome and, not receiving certain expected letters, he began to be assailed by tormenting doubts concerning the anonymous lady. Nothing less than a return to Paris (which he had only just left) could confirm or put an end to his suspicions, and on the way there he received, at Florence, a certain mysterious letter. 'I was beside myself with passion, and shed tears from sheer rage; but I made up my mind on the spot what to do. My duty was clear. I must at once proceed to Paris, and kill two guilty women and an innocent man; and then commit suicide. It will be noticed that Berlioz maintains the Byronic ideal, though with slight variations: Byron lived on soda-water and biscuits when engrossed with love, and Berlioz solemnly assures us that 'I had taken nothing but a little limejuice since we started, and my companion began to regard me as scarcely human.' Space forbids further details, but Berlioz spares us nothing. Not even the disguises bought at a milliner's, and tried on to ensure a perfect fit. Nor the storm that overtook him at sea. Nor the picturesque description of himself 'as a devil doomed to wander on the earth with a piece of the true cross in his possession. . . . But there was no murder, and there was no suicide.

The 'Mémoires' and the 'Lettres Intimes' are full of this melodrama; never before, we are assured, was there such a terrible fellow in the wide world. It is well done; indeed, Mrs. Radcliffe herself could not have bettered it; but, after all, it is not true. We know it is not true, because often when we can check Berlioz's narrative by documentary evidence, we can prove that his instinct for truth was swamped by his love for the grotesque. And that, I submit, is both the strength and the weakness of Berlioz as musician and writer. Form, melody, orchestration, harmony—all suffered occasional distortion by this itch for the unusual. Mere size intrigued him beyond all powers of resistance. He flirted with grandeur and succumbed to grandiloquence. And he was often incapable of sustained reasoning, resorting to dogmatic assertion when at a loss for argument. Writing of the custom of 'adapting' master-pieces for public consumption, he chastises Castilblaze, Fétis, Kreutzer and Habeneck, justifying himself, not by reasoning, but by: 'No, no, no; a thousand times, no. . . . No, no, no; a hundred thousand times, no.' In such a manner do the emotional argue, and Berlioz was often the victim of his emotions and of his imagination. The former were never curbed; the latter enjoyed no discipline. And just as his emotions led him into frantic actions, and just as his imagination led him to believe that he had committed other frantic actions that could not truly be charged to his discredit, so in his music he was led to ignore his artistic conscience and inflate beyond recognition noble and original ideas.

And yet, when all is written, Berlioz escaped from himself a hundred times, and his alter ego, snatching weeks of mental and emotional calmness, gave to the world the incomparable beauty that we find in such perfect work as 'La Captive,' 'Le Cinq Mai,' the 'Requiem,' and 'Roméo et Juliette.'

Church and Organ Music.

THE ORGAN OF THE TEMPLE CHURCH.

The reconstruction of such an organ as this, with its historical associations, and in view of its supervision in former years by Dr. Hopkins, the great authority of his time, must be a matter of more than passing interest to the organ world of to-day. During its life of more than two hundred years, it has passed through the hands of seven builders, from the original work of Father Smith, in 1684, to that which has just been completed by Mr. Rothwell.

As it stands now, its chief characteristic may be said to lie in the softer-toned stops (as in the Choir organ), though modern methods have been by no means neglected, excellent examples of harmonic reeds being included in the scheme. Dr. Walford Davies, the gifted organist of the church, under whose direction the work has been carried out, has decided upon a new means of stop control, consisting of tablets conveniently placed in a position parallel with the keys of each manual, a feature being the inclusion of the Pedal organ stops in the case of each manual.

Dr. Davies has, on the Thursdays of last month, given a series of organ recitals before a numerous audience, when his programmes have shown off the varied capabilities of tone and mechanism to full advantage. We give the specification of the organ :

A contemporary has been devoting space to the question as to which is the 'best choir' in London. The letters which have so far been published are naturally the result of varied and, in some cases, conflicting opinion; but no one seems yet to have considered the circumstances which must govern the results of those responsible for the training of the choirs mentioned. There are many conditions necessary if the labours of the choirs and their teachers are to be rewarded with success. In the first place the authorities of any cathedral or church should give the choirmaster a free hand, for, after all, he is their paid specialist, and should be trusted, if he be competent, to do his work conscientiously. He, too, should surely know how to choose suitable music for the varying seasons of the Church's year, and within the capacity of his choir. The needs of the congregation, and their ability to comprehend what they hear, should be considered also. Then the acoustical nature of the building bears a most important part in the effect of choral work, far greater indeed than is usually believed. It has been said that if an umbrella be dropped in St. Paul's Cathedral it will make music! The acoustical effect of the building will at all events rob the sound of much of its ugliness, and though we of course place the St. Paul's choir in the very front rank, we believe some at least of its beautiful effect to be due to the building, fine as the singing would be anywhere. The actual appearance and dimensions of the church must be also allowed for. Consider the impression caused by the glorious arches and roof of Westminster Abbey, the dome of St. Paul's, or the graceful beauty of the Temple Church! Then think of the 'square room' which too often does duty as a House of God! Surely these influences must tell not only upon the singers themselves, but also upon those who listen and worship. We know of more than one building which would damp the ardour, and the singing too, of those who make music within them.

We think, then, that to attempt to classify our London choirs, and indeed choirs generally, is a most difficult and perhaps impossible task, and we are not quite sure that it is right or wise to do so. The only possible result is the production of an unpleasant atmosphere and an unhealthy rivalry. The aim of all engaged in the work of church music should surely be to do the very best that is possible with the materials at hand. The reward will be far greater in the knowledge of good work done well than could ever be gained by fugitive opinion, too often valueless, and generally he result of insufficient knowledge and a careless review of the circumstances.

We have received an interesting book on the new organ in Manchester Cathedral, compiled by Mr. Sydney H. Nicholson, the Cathedral organist. A survey of the organs erected in the Cathedral during a period of nearly 300 years culminates in a complete description of the present splendid example of Messrs. Hill & Son's work. There are five manuals and a large pedal organ, an interesting feature being the 'screen organ,' which is in reality a second Great organ of smaller proportions than the principal Great. Another point which strikes us is that the Choir organ contains a 'family' of Dulcianans in 16, 8, 4 and 2 feet pitch, together with a Dulciana mixture. There are two Tubas, one on the screen organ (which can be played from the Choir organ keys), and one on the Solo organ. The voicing is, however, different in each case. Altogether the specification is a very fine one, and should be interesting to 'organics.' Photographs of the nave of the Cathedral, the organ console, and the Father Smith organ are reproduced, while a list of the organists of the Cathedral and the music given at the re-opening of the organ complete an excellently written brochure. The publishers are Messrs. Sherratt & Hughes, 34, Cross Street, Manchester.

The organ in Ely Cathedral has recently advanced towards completion by the addition of the solo organ, there now only remaining to be added the pedal 32 feet reed and the swell horn. A series of recitals has been arranged for Tuesdays, January 24, February 7, 14, 21. The opening recital was given by Dr. W. G. Alcock, who will be followed on the remaining dates by Mr. Sydney Nicholson, Mr. Henry G. Ley, and Dr. A. W. Wilson respectively. Messrs. Harrison's splendid instrument is entirely worthy of the glorious Cathedral in which it stands, and the recitals should attract many from far and near.

Dr. Peace, who is the Liverpool city organist, was entertained by the Liverpool and District Organists' and Choirmasters' Association at their annual conversazione on January 9 at Pembroke Chapel. The chairman (Mr. R. Francis Lloyd) thanked Dr. Peace for his recognition of their young organization, and praised his skill as an organist, so often displayed at recitals in St. George's Hall and at the church choir festivals. Dr. Peace, in thanking the chairman, said he thought that the Association had a very useful career before it. He believed their meetings would do much to break down the barriers which separated the organists of various denominations, and to secure more cordial relations between organists in general. He urged all the members present who held the dual position of organist and choirmaster to seek to become proficient in both capacities. He thought the monthly discussions and lectures on subjects of interest to both organists and choirmasters would be productive of much good toward this end. The secretary (Mr. Wm. Humphreys) gave a brief account of the formation and the work of the Association. The musical programme included solos by Miss Amy Horrocks, Miss Flossie Caley, Mr. Lloyd Moore and Mr. J. A. Hebson, and an improvisation by the guest of the evening.

The Town Hall, Auckland, New Zealand, is to possess an organ of which the Dominion will have reason to be proud. The work is in the hands of Messrs. Norman & Beard, who are building the instrument from the design of Mr. E. H. Lemare. We regret having to postpone a full account until our next issue.

The Positive Organ Company, Ltd., have recently built an organ for St. Anne's Church, Custom House, London, which was opened on November 27 by Mr. Sewell (organist of Westminster Roman Catholic Cathedral). The specification is as follows:

Is it really true that Westminster Abbey has a new organist? We are, at any rate, informed by a correspondent that Sir Henry Bridge and the Abbey organ are known to musicians the world over! We have heard Sir Frederick Bridge spoken of by Americans as Sir Bridge, but the new name strikes us as being an improvement on the latter at least.

SPECIAL SERVICES.

On January 1, selections from Gounod's sacred trilogy, 'The Redemption,' were given at St. Nicholas Cole Abbey, the solos being sung by Miss Ada Tunks, Miss Esther Franklin, Mr. Herbert Lyon and Mr. Charlton Hutchinson. Mr. Herbert Hodge presided at the organ.

In addition to the special 'Wesley' Sunday observed at St. Bees Priory Church on August 14, the whole of Dr. S. S. Wesley's organ works have been played during the past year on the fine instrument by Father Willis, either as recital pieces or voluntaries—viz., the Psalm-tune studies, fifteen and other compositions of the larger order.

On December 15, Spohr's 'Last Judgment' was sung by the choir of St. Matthew's Church, Upper Clapton. The solo parts were sung by Master N. Campton, Messrs. Winn, McAuslane and High. The organist and choir-master, Mr. W. G. Low, presided at the organ.

On December 18, at the Upper Tooting Wesleyan Church, selections from Handel's 'Messiah' were given. The soloists were Miss Florence Richardson, Madame Beatrice Goddard, Mr. Fuller Clarke, and Mr. Sidney Clarke. Miss Winifred Balding presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. Allan H. Brown at the organ.

Mauder's 'Bethlehem' was performed at Chigwell Church, on December 18, by a choir of over one hundred voices, under the direction of Mr. Henry Riding. Mr. E. Cuthbert Nunn, who compiled the libretto of the work, was the organist.

Mr. John E. West's cantata, 'The story of Bethlehem,' was performed at Wanstead Parish Church on Christmas Day under the direction of Mr. G. Vincent Evans at the organ. The cantata was preceded by the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis, sung to a setting by Mr. Evans.

An orchestral service was held at Brixton Church on January 1, under the direction of Mr. Douglas Redman, assisted at the organ by Mr. Welton Hickin. Mendelssohn's 'Scotch' Symphony was performed, and sacred songs were sung by Miss Florence Riden between the movements.

The first public conference of the Free Church Musicians' Union for the present year was held in the Downs Baptist Church, Clapton, on Tuesday, January 10. Mr. Horace Holmes presided, and addresses were given by the new president, Dr. Thomas Keighley, the Mayor of Hackney, W. Fenton Jones, Esq., and the general secretary Mr. H. F. Nicholls. Musical selections were rendered under the conduct of Mr. W. C. Webb. There was a large attendance.

PART-SONGS.

My soul would drink those echoes. Midnight by the sea. Qui vive. A song of love's coming. By A. C. Mackenzie.

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

In composing the part-songs named above, Sir Alexander Mackenzie has given influential recognition to the newer mode of writing for choral voices, and has made a substantial and valuable addition to modern part-song literature. They have the freedom of treatment directed towards choral effect and adequate musical reflection of the words, but not the licence that ignores the restrictions of vocal writing and the consideration of musical form. The harmonies are boldly conceived, but always with a purpose. The writing is as a rule of the 'perpendicular' variety, and the interest is largely carried forward by picturesque harmonic colour. But the colour is not laid on in the isolated splashes to which less skilful writers resort; it is bound together into a logical succession by firm and continuous outlines.

'My soul would drink those echoes' is a majestic and very individually harmonized eight-part setting of lines by Byron. The restless tonality admirably depicts the indefinable longing expressed in the words

Oh, that I were
 The viewless spirit of a lovely sound,
 A living voice, a breathing harmony,
 A bodiless enjoyment, born and dying
 With the blest tone that made me.

The last three lines of the quotation are sung twice to an expressive uprising progression reaching an eloquent climax on 'a breathing harmony,' to which follows a quieter and more poignant setting of the succeeding words. The music closely obeys the varying suggestions of the poem without breaking its continuity as a piece of almost symphonic writing for the voices, or disturbing its breadth of thought.

A totally different mood is encountered in 'Midnight by the sea,' an eight-part setting of words by Noel Paton. The opening phrase—'Waves of the wild north sea'—introduces a note of dramatic emphasis and vivid vocal tone-painting which is sustained to the end. A striking effect is obtained at the words 'in silence deep.' The sopranos singing softly in thirds move up to the height of their compass, while the basses, also in thirds, move down to the depths of theirs. The rest are for the moment silent, and the abnormal gap between the two divisions of singing voices lends something eerie and unearthly to the effect of the passage. The same device is repeated later at the words 'Whither? Whence? Why?'

'Qui vive' is even more striking and original. It is designed for eight voices and a baritone soloist, whose duties are confined to singing the words of the title now and then as a kind of obligato. The characteristic feature of the piece is what may be described, for want of a better term, as the 'orchestration' of the voices, by which the composer has contrived some picturesque descriptive effects, some broad, some fleeting and momentary. One idea which is employed and developed with extreme effectiveness deserves quotation:

With 'A song of love's coming,' which is also written for eight voices, we leave the dramatic and pictorial elements and return to the manner and mood of the first of the above examples. Here again appropriateness is studied in fitting music to the changing sentiments of the words (by Ethel Clifford), and at the same time the construction and development of the music are symphonic. The composer has not given way to the temptation to sentimentalize over the theme of the poem, but has maintained the full strength and distinction of his style, without any undue austerity. The part-song is worked up at the end to a fine ecstatic climax of rich harmonies.

It will be seen that this collection is one of exceptional interest. There can be no charge of decadence against a style which is capable of such exemplification.

PIANOFORTE MUSIC.

Six little pieces, on sketches by J. S. Bach. Arranged by Edward MacDowell.

[Elkin & Co.]

Bach and MacDowell had not much in common, but the American has conformed admirably to the spirit of the German in arranging these little sketches. Many modern 'derangers' would have 'improved' them out of recognition in an effort to compete with Liszt and his class; but MacDowell has done his work with greater reverence and has practically confined his personal contribution to the object of adapting to the pianoforte what was probably sketched for the harpsichord. Not knowing the nature and extent of the material left by Bach, we refrain from pointing out those momentary glimpses of what seems a little foreign to the spirit of the older composer—it would be dangerous to do so. Certainly there is nothing in the pieces that is not completely acceptable to the musician's as opposed to the purist's ear.

The Musical Directory, Annual and Almanack.

[Rudall, Carte & Co.]

This useful and, to many persons like ourselves, indispensable year-book has reached its 50th issue. It is full of information very carefully compiled. The important musical events of 1910 are duly chronicled, there is an Obituary, a list of Musical Institutions and Societies (Metropolitan and Provincial), and the addresses of practically the whole of the musical profession and music traders. The directory forms a volume of over five hundred pages and costs three shillings.

Correspondence.

THE STUDY OF RHYTHM.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

SIR,—The correspondence on this subject will not be without use if by it any definite conclusions can be obtained. As I understand the situation, Mr. Abdy Williams does not contend that rhythmical units are to be found in all music, but that in certain cases they may be present. It is evident that the question is not one of the existence of a law of rhythm, which can be always applied; no 'law' is claimed.

A good deal has been written on the subject of this theory by various writers; but, as it seems to me, no one has been able to formulate a theory which will stand the test of minute examination, and which will apply to all cases. As this is so, what I may call 'the measure theory' becomes simply a question of taste involving no fundamental principles. The discussion will then turn on the advisability of reading into music pauses which are not outwardly apparent. The Air with variations, in Beethoven's Op. 26, will serve as a good test-case of the value of the theory. If we are to adopt the 'measure' theory the construction of the first phrase would be somewhat as follows:

Now in the first place this division into measures is not absolutely accurate. As Mr. Abdy Williams well remarks, 'If we divide it mathematically we ruin it.' In the second place, no one would dream of performing the passage in this manner. What then becomes of the practical utility of the theory? Finally, most people will agree that the passage involves a gradual rise to the cadence bar. If we make a caesura in bar two, not only would the free flow of the music be spoiled, but the interpolation of an anacrusis would bring into too great prominence the A flat in bar three, and thereby weaken the effect of the cadence bar.

A study of the variations on this theme will show how rhythmic variety can be obtained on a basis of strict phrase form. The third variation gives us a good illustration of the effect of a gradual rise to the cadence bar. Would any theorist wish to split up this passage into measures, or to insert a caesura at any point? Surely the ultimate fact in the consideration of this kind of musical rhythm is the phrase, which may or may not be sub-divided into sections, and around which any amount of variety of treatment is possible.

In conclusion, I certainly agree that Riemann and Lussy are indebted to Greek theory. But Greek rhythmic theory was vitiated by an 'exploded' fallacy—the fallacy of the divisibility of motion.—Yours faithfully,

T. H. YORKE TROTTER.

THE WHOLE-TONE SCALE.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

SIR,—Mr. Clutsum, in his interesting articles on the whole-tone scale, mentions that he can find 'no example that at all represents the effect, the genesis of which lies in the passage shown in Example 3.' But the following passage from Debussy's 'Jardins sous la pluie' seems to constitute such an example. Has Mr. Clutsum, in spite of his careful search in many modern works, failed to notice this passage, or have I failed to catch his exact meaning when he speaks of 'the tonal chord associated with chromatic progression'?

Yours faithfully,

FRANK MERRICK (Jun.).

[We have referred Mr. Merrick's letter to Mr. Clutsum, who writes to us as follows:]

The reference to Debussy's pianoforte piece 'Jardins sous la Pluie,' sent you by Mr. Merrick, in no way discounts the remark in my article which he quotes.

Primarily there is no complete chord of six notes (an essential) to be found in the passage, although I admit the incomplete similarity, and was also aware of it. But the trend of my article was to show that the tonal chord of six complete notes was for practical purposes simply a dominant, with half-a-dozen roots at its user's disposal for modulatory purposes. And in this direction I am afraid a great many of your readers may have misunderstood the real purpose of my article.

'BONEY'S LAMENTATION' AND 'TO RODNEY WE WILL GO.'

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

SIR,—In reply to Miss Lucy E. Broadwood's letter, I wish to point out that what she considers 'an irregular fifth bar twice in the first half of the tune,' viz., 'Rodney's Glory,' is in reality a strikingly characteristic inspiration of O'Carolan's genius, and reflects the rhythm of his own Irish words, which is tolerably well imitated in the English lyric by Owen Roe O'Sullivan. O'Carolan's song is entitled 'Rígh Seamus,' and is an elegy in praise of King James II. and the Old Pretender. His metres have been a puzzle to English and foreign musicians, and even Mr. Alfred Moffat, who has so well edited a book of Irish airs, falls into the mistake of printing a whole bar, 'to complete,' as he says, 'the form of the eight-barred period,' in his setting of 'Bumpus Squire Jones.'

The source for the words of 'Rodney's glory' is an accessible little book in Irish, giving the Irish songs of Eoghann ruadh (Owen Roe) O'Sullivan, edited by Rev. P. Dinneen, M.D., entitled 'Amhrain Eoghain Ruadh Uí Suilleabhain,' published by the Gaelic League, Dublin, in 1901. In his admirable introduction he prints the eight English verses, as written by Owen Roe, who fought in that memorable encounter. I also possess a good MS. version of the song—and copies are to be found in the Royal Irish Academy, Dublin.

As to the source of the tune, I have two MS. versions: one is dated 1756 and the other is 1795 or 1796. The latter belonged to William Elliot Hudson, and formerly belonged to his father, Edward Hudson, M.D., who wrote an 'Ode on St. Cecilia's Day,' published in Dublin in 1788.

In regard to 'Hussey's Maggot,' I have no doubt but that it was either composed by Mr. Hussey or popularised by him in the second quarter of the 18th century. Miss Broadwood, however, does not seem to be aware that there were Husseys in Ireland long before the year 1170; in fact the O'Hussey family were noted Irish bards. But even assuming that Hussey, the gentleman piper, was of the English stock that came over in 1170, surely a residence of nearly 600 years ought to settle the matter of nationality. If the Irish Hussey of 1730 is to be regarded as English, because a supposed ancestor came over from England 600 years previously, then similarly Henry Purcell, the great English composer, must be classed as a Norman, whose ancestor came over to England in 1066. This Hussey, the gentleman piper, was an uncle of Bishop Hussey of Waterford and Lismore, the bosom friend of Edmund Burke.—Yours faithfully,

W. H. GRATTAN FLOOD.

THE NATIONALITY OF FOLK-SONGS.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

SIR,—Do not you think the argument as to whether old airs were originally English, Scotch, or Irish very stupid? It is well known that before any of them were put to paper they were sung by men who travelled about the three countries, and different singers rendered them differently, so that it is quite possible that when musicians first thought of preserving them the same airs (varied) were taken down in England, Scotland and Ireland, but where they were originally sung will ever remain a question. The songs of Ophelia were entirely traditional until about the end of the 18th century, when Mr. Linley took them down as they were sung by Miss Field, and Dr. Arnold noted them from the singing of Mrs. Jordan, the notes in both instances being the same but the rhythm different. Since then I believe copies have been discovered, but the instance shows the difficulty in taking down traditional songs, especially if sung by itinerant vocalists.

Obituary.

We regret to have to record the following deaths:

Dr. HENRY WATSON, at Salford, on January 3, after two days' illness, at the age of sixty-four. Dr. Watson was one of the best-known musicians in Manchester, by reason of his active musical operations, his public benefactions and his endearing personality. The valuable 'Henry Watson Music Library' of 30,000 volumes, the accumulation of forty years, he made over to the Corporation of Manchester, for the use of the public, in 1899. In the following year he gave his magnificent collection of musical instruments, over 300 in number, to the Royal Manchester College of Music. An account of his life, his works and his possessions appeared in the Musical Times for June, 1909, with a special portrait supplement. Our Manchester correspondent writes: 'Dr. Henry Watson's sudden death has overshadowed all other events of the past month; he was about his work two days before the end came, conducting the usual rehearsal of the Gentlemen's Glee Club on New Year's eve. Apart from his antiquarian and research work connected with his remarkable library, he was probably best known through connection with numerous choral bodies in and around Manchester: the Manchester Gentlemen's Glee Club and the Manchester Vocal Society, the Victoria Glee Club, Chorley Choral Society, Stockport Vocal Union, were all directed by him at one time or another. "Unspoiled by his wide knowledge," writes one who knew him well, "kindly and genial in manner and thought to all who had the privilege of knowing him; patient and helpful to all those whose capacity was less than his own, he will be sorely missed by all who knew him, and mourned by many friends."'

Colonel T. B. SHAW-HELLIER, at Taormina, Sicily, aged seventy-four. From 1886 to 1893, Colonel Shaw-Hellier was commandant at Kneller Hall, and much of the efficiency and success now characteristic of that institution originated with his administration. The qualities which fitted him so admirably for his task were those gained from active military service and long devotion to music; to these were added qualities which earned him the universal regard of his friends.

THOMAS RODOLPHUS CROGER, aged sixty-two. Over twenty years ago he helped to found the Nonconformist Musical Union, of which he became secretary for fifteen years and vice-president for eight years. He was also for a time conductor of the orchestra. His book 'Notes on conductors and conducting' is widely read.

RICHARD VON PERGER, of Vienna, aged fifty-six. He was a pupil of Brahms, and had considerable gifts as a composer, in which capacity his works included chamber music and a comic opera. He was also a conductor. For some time past he contributed the monthly Vienna letter to the Musical Times.

FREDERICK WILLIAM CHANOT, aged fifty-three. He was a member of the family of violin makers, who have maintained a high reputation for four generations. He founded the well known 'Edition Chanut' of violin works.

Professor RICHARD BARTMUS, at Dessau, on Christmas Day, fifty-one years of age. He was one of the foremost organists in Germany, and a composer of repute.

Herr JOHANNES ELMBLAD, of Stockholm, aged fifty-seven. He was once a famous Bayreuth singer, and became chief conductor at the Royal Opera at Stockholm.

Rev. W. E. DICKSON, honorary canon of Ely Cathedral, at one time a keen controversialist on the subject of cathedral music.

ENGLISH FOLK-SONG.

[A lecture, delivered before the Oxford Folk-Music Society, November 16, 1910, by R. VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, Mus. Doc., with vocal illustrations by J. STEUART WILSON, of King's College, Cambridge.]

YOUR committee has generously given me a very wide field to traverse this afternoon—no less a subject than the whole range of folk-music. I wish I could avail myself in its entirety of the opportunity given me, but there are of necessity two boundaries which I must not pass—the limits of your patience and the limits of my own knowledge. I am therefore confining myself to one aspect of the subject, namely, the folk-songs of England.

English folk-song has long been the ugly duckling of the folk-song family. For years musicians and experts, while fully recognizing the existence of traditional art in every other country, denied the possibility of there being any English folk-song. Mr. Carl Engel, writing about 1878, said, 'Some musical inquirers have expressed the opinion that the country people of England are not in the habit of singing,' but he adds, 'This opinion would be found to be only partially correct if search were made in the proper places.' Mr. Engel was not aware that search in the 'proper places' had already been made on a small scale, and the results published in a volume bearing a name very honourable in the annals of English folk-song—'Sussex Songs,' by the Rev. John Broadwood, published in 1848. Why Mr. Broadwood's efforts were not followed up remains a mystery, but apparently no more was done for the cause until 1889, when Mr. Baring-Gould made a large collection of West-Country songs, and published a small selection of them under the title of 'Songs of the West.' This was followed in 1891 by Mr. Frank Kidson's 'Traditional Tunes,' obtained chiefly from Yorkshire—in which, by-the-way, Oxford had a hand, as it was published by Messrs. Taphouse; then came 'English County Songs,' edited by Miss Lucy Broadwood and Mr. Fuller Maitland. In 1898 the Folk-Song Society was founded 'for the purpose of collecting folk-songs, ballads and tunes.' Finally, in 1903, Mr. Cecil Sharp began his exhaustive researches in Somerset, which revealed a wealth of melody hitherto undreamt of, and his example has fired the enthusiasm of many collectors and disseminators of folk-song, and to-day we are present at the inauguration of the 'Oxford Folk-Music Society, founded for the purpose of preserving, encouraging, and reviving traditional songs and dances among the people.' Thus it seems that the ugly duckling is beginning to show its plumage, and is, in the opinion of many, turning out to be as white a swan as any of its elder brothers.

Now, although we in England are rather late in the day in our efforts to collect and preserve traditional music, this is not altogether a disadvantage, for much of the folk-music of foreign countries, and even in Scotland and Ireland, was collected and published about 150 years ago—a period when musicians had no scruple in altering and, to their minds, 'improving' what they collected, to fit in with the supposed correct style of the music of the moment. Thus no collection of folk-music of that period is above suspicion. Nowadays, however, a new spirit animates the collector; he wishes to present to the public exactly what he heard and nothing else, so that you can be sure that what you find in the publications of modern collectors are exact transcripts of the songs of folk-singers.

I must now pass on to a further limitation in the scope of this lecture—the limitation of my own knowledge. I am neither an archeologist, an antiquarian, or even a folk-lorist, nor have I any expert knowledge of the sister art of ballad poetry. My knowledge of the folk-song is entirely confined to the musical side, and it is from the musical side that I hope to put folk-song before you to-day; for, whatever interest they may have to others, folk-songs must be supremely interesting to the musician. This is for two reasons—first, because of the actual beauty of so many of the tunes themselves; and secondly, because folk-songs, and especially those of his own nation, must be interesting to the musician, since they represent national characteristics in their very simplest form. The unconscious utterances of unlettered people must of necessity be the outcome of their own characters unaffected by extraneous influences, and this is true of the folk-songs of any nation, whether they are bad, good, or indifferent. In them we should expect to find on a small scale just those qualities and limitations which we find, fully developed, in the cultivated music of that same nation, and to the musician this fact ought to be a touchstone of sincerity, a guide which shall show him whether the cultured music of any nation is developing on lines which the personal characters of its creators allow of, or whether it is something exotic, which is likely to lead nowhere and to perish in its infancy.

Before I go further I should like to explain exactly what I mean when I use the word 'Folk-song.'

The art of music is not a series of 'tricks of the trade,' which can be imparted by a master to his apprentice and acquired merely by diligent study. No amount of learning can put it into anyone if the germ is not already there. Study and instruction can develop and mature, but there must be something spontaneous and intuitive to start with; and further, the principles of form, of expression, of climax and proportion which composers study, are not arbitrary formule, but are, as Sir Hubert Parry argues in his 'Art of Music,' the developments of instincts which belong to human nature itself. Now, if we believe this—and unless we do believe it the art of music becomes a mere mathematical puzzle—we shall expect to find under special circumstances a form of art which is absolutely spontaneous and unselfconscious, and we should expect to find illustrated in this unselfconscious art those very principles which go to make up the art of the cultured musician. Now this is not mere theory, for we do actually find in every country, side by side with the selfconscious art of professional composers systematically written down, another form of the art which from its very circumstances must be purely oral and spontaneous—unaffected by conscious training or extraneous influence, namely, that music which has grown up, no one knows how, among the unlettered and unsophisticated members of the community. And this music is not mere clownish gibberish, but is within its limits often very beautiful, and obeys, or rather illustrates, all those principles of form, of expression, of proportion, which we are accustomed to look for in the work of educated composers. This spontaneous utterance is known as Folk-Song.

I will not apologise for this word. It is a hybrid expression adapted from the German 'Volks-lied,' but there is no good English equivalent word for it, so we have perforce to use the term 'folk-song' to distinguish these genuinely traditional and spontaneous utterances from the popular songs of definite composers, or national songs, as they are sometimes called ('Volksthümliches Lied' in German)—such songs as 'Rule, Britannia,' 'Das Wacht am Rhein,' or the 'Marseillaise.' I would not be misunderstood here. I am far from saying that the folk-song is necessarily more beautiful than the 'national' song; the distinction is not one of quality but of kind. Some people, however, do not recognise this distinction, at all events as far as England is concerned. They would try to place our real folk-songs in the same category as 'Heart of oak' or 'Tom Bowling'; indeed, they sometimes go so far as to say that all these English folk-songs which collectors find stored up in the minds of country singers are mere corrupted reminiscences of songs by 17th and 18th century composers. Now, when we hear the best specimens of English folk-song, does not this contention seem absurd? What resemblance have the vast majority of our folk-songs to any of the known compositions of past centuries—or indeed of any period—for it is one of the distinguishing marks of genuine folk-music that it can never be dated: at one time it seems to point back to a remote past, and at another to belong absolutely to our modern life—it is ever old and at the same time ever new.

But supposing for the moment that these tunes are corruptions of compositions by old English masters, what must the originals have been? Some of us think that even these so-called corruptions are good enough as they stand: well, the composer of the tune in its original, pure form, must have been a melodist before whom even Schubert might pale. Is it likely that such a composer would have passed into oblivion so that even his name is not remembered? 'Who then,' you may well ask, 'did compose the folk-song? It did not come into being by a sort of spontaneous generation.' Now, is this so impossible? Can we not imagine a tune which literally represents the combined imagination of the community? I think that this will appear quite a reasonable proposition if we remember two facts: First, that folk-music is an applied art, and that the singing of folk-songs, as far as the tune is concerned, is hardly a selfconscious act. The tune is merely a vehicle for words or dancing. A traditional singer can hardly ever think of a tune alone; he can very seldom hum you the tune of one of his ballads, and if words he knows are sung to a new tune he will often not perceive the difference. Secondly, the folk-song obtains currency by purely oral methods; it is never stereotyped by writing or print. The singer who sings us a folk-song to-day, learned it by ear perhaps from his father, who learned it from a friend, who learned it from his mother, until we get back to a remote period when someone invented—not surely the tune which you or I heard yesterday—but the germ from which it has gradually evolved. When I was a child we used to play a game called 'Russian Scandal.' We all sat in a row, and the child at one end whispered a story into the ear of the next, he in his turn whispered his version of it to the next, and so on till the end of the row was reached; then the last child would say out loud the story as he had received it. The general scheme of the story would probably be the same as the original, but the details and the language would be different. Now who was the author of the final version of that story? Not the first child obviously, because it was not exactly what he had said, nor the last, for he was only giving his version of what he had heard. Each child has had a share in it; it is the product of a joint authorship.

Now this is what has happened, on a much larger scale, in the case of the folk-song; and moreover, the hypothetical originator of any particular melody will probably have sung, not to one, but to many. They in their turn will spread their versions abroad and, unlike the children and the story, will not be bound by regard to verbal truth, but will freely alter as their artistic predilections suggest, so that in a short time there would be many variants of the same tune, all founded on a common basis but varying in detail from each other. Only those variants would survive which approved themselves to others, so that by a process of selection and evolution the folk-song has come down to us as the product of the united imagination of the whole community. This theory of folk-music is not, as some people would have us believe, the idiosyncrasy of one English faddist, but is held (with regard to folk-poetry, at all events) by nearly all the authorities on the subject. Professor Gilbert Murray, in his 'Rise of the Greek Epic,' has shown how even primitive books can in this way be attributed to a common authorship, and this 'communal' view is upheld by Sir Charles Stanford in one of his recently-published essays.

This, then, is what I mean by folk-song—a spontaneous musical utterance by unlettered people which, by process of evolution, has become the common property of that people.

The folk-song has, of course, its limitations; it is limited both lengthways and broadways: lengthways, by the stanza of a ballad or the figure of a dance, so that the folk-song is always on a small scale; broadways, it is limited in that it is purely melodic, the question of accompanying harmonies not entering at all into the folk-singer's scheme. These limitations are not altogether disadvantages, for it is they that very largely give the folk-song those characteristics which composed music does not possess, and the most striking of these characteristics arise from the fact that folk-song is purely melodic. Our harmonic music, as you are aware, can almost always be referred to one of two schemes, which are known as the major mode and the minor mode; but when harmony is left out of the question, the schemes on which pure melody may be built are far more numerous. It is a most unfortunate thing that these melodic schemes or modes have acquired the name 'ecclesiastical.' They are called the 'ecclesiastical modes' simply because that great mass of purely melodic music, the music of the Roman Church, is built up on this principle. This leads many people to suppose that a modal melody is of necessity something archaic and mediæval, which can have nothing but an antiquarian interest for us to-day. It has indeed been suggested that modal folk-songs are nothing more than reminiscences of pre-Reformation church-going days; but what connection, other than that of mode, have such tunes as 'Tarry Trowers' and 'Seventeen come Sunday' with Gregorian music? These melodic scales existed long before Gregorian music; and the Roman Church, in all probability, made up its music in the vernacular of the period—just as the Salvation Army does nowadays; indeed, do scales and modes exist at all except, like the equator, in the minds of scientists? I once heard a distinguished musician express astonishment that a countryman could sing 'correctly' in the Dorian mode. This is simply putting the cart before the horse. The countryman did not know he was singing in the Dorian mode, any more than M. Jourdain knew he was speaking prose; he was merely singing what came natural to him. Systems of scales, and indeed all other 'rules' of art are explanations, not regulations. There is no sense in asking if the folk-singer is singing rightly or wrongly; what we are concerned with is what he does or does not sing; if it is good, we preserve it as an artistic asset; if it is worthless, we leave it to perish.

I expect that anyone here, who is learned in the modes as they are set forth in systems of plain-song, will complain that these examples which Mr. Wilson has sung, and which I have ascribed to the various modes, are not strictly in those modes: very likely they do not obey the laws about absolute initials and conceded modulations laid down by mediæval musicians, but are these not merely rules of composition, not tests of modality? To take a parallel instance, no one will deny that Wagner's 'Preislied' is in C major because it may not fit in with all the rules laid down in the composition Primers. The modes are not survivals of mediæval times, they are as alive to-day as ever they were. For generations, it is true, composers have been content with the major and minor modes, but the most modern composers, especially those of the Russian and French schools, are beginning to find infinite harmonic suggestion hidden in the melodic outlines of folk-song, which give quite a new colour to their music: not a pseudo-archaism, but a living means of expression.

I now want to make a digression, and say a little about the words of folk-songs. You will have noticed how much more perfect are the tunes which you have heard to-day than the words to which those tunes are attached, and this is true of many folk-songs: the tunes are complete entities, while the words, though often delightful and beautiful in sentiment, are often obviously corrupted, often ungrammatical, and occasionally pure nonsense. The explanation of this seems to be that the words alone occupy the singer's selfconscious attention, while the tune is looked on largely as a vehicle for the words; and it is this unconscious instinct which preserves the purity of the tune, while the lack of it mars the words. Thus we have to face the fact that, while folk-music has come down to us in full vigour, the corresponding art of the ballad is in a state of decay. But the decay of ballad poetry has another cause—the invention of printing. The very earliest printers began the practice of printing popular ballads in chap-books or on single sheets called broadsides, and it often happened that vulgarised or imperfect versions of these ballads were issued by ignorant printers. These degraded versions became thereby stereotyped, and thus the decay of the ballad set in; moreover, printers, finding that these printed ballads became popular, were not content with issuing garbled versions of real folk-ballads, but began to employ professional scribblers to invent new doggerel more or less in the ballad style, dealing with any event—usually a murder—which was exciting popular attention at the moment. These ballad-sheets occupied the position of the modern halfpenny paper; they have formed part of the stock-in-trade of Autolycus and his fellow peddlars almost down to the present day. No music was of course printed with the words, it would not have been of much use; so that when a man bought a new ballad, the question arose, How was he to sing it? Sometimes on the top of the sheet there was a direction that the new words were to be sung to some well-known tune, otherwise the singer had to find some tune already in his repertoire and sing the new ballad to that. So it came about that the fine old tunes were preserved, while the fine old words to which they formerly were sung were superseded by worthless and ephemeral doggerel. For instance, we sometimes find quite modern verses about Napoleon or Wellington being sung to tunes which point back obviously to a much earlier time. Happily for the genuine folk-ballad in its pure form still survives to a certain extent. Two good examples of this class of folk-song are 'Geordie' and 'The trees they do grow high,' which you shall now hear in the versions in which they are sung in Cambridgeshire.

[In the course of the lecture the following examples were sung by Mr. Steuart Wilson:

Bushes and briars.	The cuckoo and the
As I walked out.	nightingale.
A bold young farmer.	Jack the sailor.
Tarry trowsers.	Spanish ladies.
Geordie.	The saucy, bold robber.
The trees they do grow	Ward the pirate.

I hope that the examples which you have heard to-day have been enough to prove to you that there does exist in England a definite genus of folk-music quite distinct from composed or art-music. Of course there is not an absolutely clear dividing line, but this does not prevent the two genera being completely divided from each other. Wild flowers and garden flowers are distinct, yet it is often hard to say whether a particular specimen belongs to the wild or garden variety; so it is occasionally difficult to say whether a particular song is folk-song or not, but I believe it is true of flowers, and it is certainly true of song, to say that these borderland specimens are of no artistic value, and so have little real bearing on the point. It may be occasionally, very occasionally, true, that a tune which has all the characteristics of folk-song is derived from a tune by a known composer, and has been transformed by the people into their own idiom. In the same way I believe a garden flower occasionally reverts to the wild pattern. But even when this does happen, and I may say that in most of the supposed cases, like Leveridge's 'All in the Downs,' it is much more probable that the supposed 'composer' of the tune was himself adapting an already existing folk-song: even, I say, when this transformation does occur, we must pre-suppose a folk-idiom into which the tune is to be transformed, which proves conclusively that the folk-song idiom, as a thing apart, does exist.

Now, I do not want you to go away with the impression that I, or anyone else think that folk-song, as such, is necessarily beautiful; there are dull and stupid folk-tunes, just as there are dull and stupid examples of composed music. But the lesson which we learn from the folk-song is that the power to invent beautiful music is an inborn instinct in certain human beings, which cannot be added from the outside if it does not exist in them already.

Some people still deny that England has any folk-music, or at all events they hold that what specimens we find are of no artistic value. They may be right, and we collectors may be all wrong—those that look on see most of the game. But the matter does not end there. If we deny to the English the possession of folk-songs of any value, we must of necessity deny to them any spontaneous musical instinct, and it surely follows that to try to develop what is not there is merely ploughing the sand. Then what an awful travesty all our Mus. Bacs., Mus. Docs., and O. U. M. U.'s and O. U. M. C.'s, and our whole paraphernalia of musical activity must appear. If music is inborn in the Englishman, surely it must show itself in his folk-songs; if his folk-songs are worthless, let him once for all give up all claim to be musical. But I believe that our English folk-songs do give undoubted evidence that we are fundamentally musicians, and yet it must be confessed that most of our cultivated music, whether creative or interpretative, has seldom up to the present shown any very definite characteristics of its own. When we hear French or German music—whether good or bad—there is no doubt that it is French or German. But can one ever say, except in a very limited degree, 'That violinist belongs to the English School,' or 'That piece of music is obviously by an Englishman.'

Now, I am not a wholesale advocate of 'nationalism' in music. Music has been called the universal language, and to a certain extent this is true. The greatest music is universal in its appeal, and we want our English music to be world-wide in its appeal also, and not merely parochial. But the great composers have achieved universal admiration, not by sinking their personal—and therefore their national—characteristics, but by developing them. This is true probably of all the arts; for instance, no creators have been more characteristic of their own nation than Shakespeare, Reynolds, Bach, Beethoven, or Wagner.

The study of our own folk-songs may help to show us how we may develop on the lines most congenial to our own characters. We cannot, if we wished, create a 'national' style artificially. To write rhapsodies on national themes is a delightful exercise for the composer, and may show up the folk-song to the hearer in a new and pleasing light, but merely to take a handful of English folk-songs and dilute them to taste with some patent Strauss mixture or a little Brahms-and-water will not make a national style. Ultimately it is a personal, and not a national style that is to be desired. Smith and Brown have got to write Smithian and Brownian music, just as Beethoven and Schubert wrote Beethovenian and Schubertian music. However, the individual is the member of some race and shares many of his characteristics with his fellow-countrymen, and the most individual art is usually also the most characteristic of the race as a whole. Therefore I would advise all musicians and lovers of music to study their own folk-songs; it will probably fill up a blank in their musical horizon, and help to suggest to them their own limitations and qualities, and their general tendencies as a musical race.

This study must not take the place of study of the great foreign musicians. We must of necessity build on the great traditions which we, in common with the whole of Europe, have inherited from Bach, Beethoven, Schubert, and Wagner, and in the matter of pure technique it would be folly to shut our ears to the teaching of better-equipped nations, but let us apply the lesson to our own necessities and be the masters of our means, not its slaves.

The specimens of English folk-songs you have heard to-day have been collected as part of a movement which is going on all over England to recover our traditional melodies and put them once again in the possession of the nation. The natural development of the folk-song has, I freely admit, been checked. I think myself that these checks have been purely artificial, and therefore the process of setting the development going again must to a certain extent be artificial also. The plant which has been dug up and left to decay must be replanted: some of the plants will doubtless wither and die, but those which have real vitality will live in their new surroundings. The folk-song as we present it to you now, can of course never take the place of what has existed in the past; that is gone as entirely as the old life to which it belonged. The folk-song is entering on a new stage in its career, and will I believe again live adapted to new needs and new circumstances.

LONDON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The first important event of the 1911 concert season occurred on January 13, when the Leeds Philharmonic Choir paid a visit to Queen's Hall, and sang under the direction of M. Safonoff. The chief numbers in the programme were Bach's unaccompanied eight-part motet 'Sing ye to the Lord,' and Brahms's 'Triumphlied,' works which fully tested the capabilities of the Choir. The former provided one of the most brilliant feats of choral execution that have been heard in London for some years. It demands exceptional staying power on the part of the chorists, but the Leeds singers encountered its difficulties with such precision as to induce in the listener's mind a feeling of security and confidence which nothing occurred to disturb. In both the Bach and the Brahms, executive excellence was allied to expressive meaning and rich tone, the latter only marred by a suspicion of shrillness among the sopranos. The programme also included two choral works by Mrs. Margaret Meredith, to words by Mr. Owen Seaman, namely: 'Requiem on the death of Queen Victoria' and 'In Memoriam the passing of King Edward the Seventh.' There is much merit in the music, but it was trying to listen to two successive dirges. The Orchestra played the 'Oberon' overture, Tchaikovsky's 'Francesca da Rimini' fantasia, and Mozart's 'Kleine nachtmusik' in G for strings alone. Mr. Fricker conducted the motet.

The concert given under Professor Müller-Reuter is referred to on p. 81.

INCORPORATED SOCIETY OF MUSICIANS.

The twenty-sixth annual conference of this Society was held in Edinburgh, December 26 to 30. About 300 members attended. The meetings were held in the Royal Hotel and the Music Classroom of the University, under the chairmanship of Professor Niecks, Lieutenant George Miller, Dr. Cowen and Mr. Arthur J. Curle.

On December 27 meetings of the examiners of the Society and of the General Council were held, and a reception to the delegates by the Council and members of the Edinburgh section was given at the Royal Hotel. The guests were received by Professor and Mrs. Niecks, Mrs. Scott Riddell (treasurer of the Edinburgh section), Mr. A. J. Curle (delegate to the General Council), and Mr. W. Martin Hobkirk (hon. secretary of the Edinburgh section). Professor Niecks gave a short address of welcome, and an enjoyable programme of music was performed. Songs were contributed by Miss Mary Dixon (Glasgow) and Mr. Robert Burnett (Edinburgh); violin solos by Mr. James Winram, and two movements from an Orchestral suite by Mr. W. B. Moonie, specially arranged for two pianofortes, were played by Mr. A. Scott Jupp and Mr. W. B. Moonie. The accompanists were Mr. George Short and Mr. W. Martin Hobkirk.

On December 28 a special morning service was held in St. Giles's Cathedral, at which the Rev. A. Wallace Williamson, D.D., Chaplain-in-Ordinary to the King in Scotland, occupied the pulpit. Lord Provost Brown presided at the opening meeting of the conference, held in the University Music Classroom in the forenoon, and extended a warm welcome to the visitors. Professor Niecks then delivered his inaugural address, which was entitled 'New Ideas and Ideals of Music Teaching.' In the afternoon the Rev. A. Cart de Lafontaine read a paper on 'Spanish Music.' A concert of Chamber Music by Spanish composers was given in the evening. The performers were the Wessely String Quartet, Madame Sobrino (soprano), and Señor Carlos Sobrino (pianist).

At the forenoon meeting, on December 29, a paper on 'National Opera,' by Mr. Charles Manners, who was unable to be present, was read by Mr. Francis E. Barrett, of London. In the afternoon Mr. J. A. Rodgers, Sheffield, read a paper on 'Musical festivals: their history, purpose and prospects.' An important social function associated with the conference was the reception given in the evening in the Royal Scottish Museum by the Lord Provost, Magistrates and Council of the city. Over 1,200 guests attended, and were received on their arrival by Lord Provost and Mrs. Brown.

On December 30 the annual general meeting was held in the forenoon, and in the afternoon the Masonic members attending the conference were received by the R.W.M. and members of the Lodge Canongate Kilwinning, No. 2. R.W.M. William Weir presided and drew attention to the fact that St. John's Chapel, in which they assembled, was the oldest lodge-room in the world. The annual banquet given in the evening at the Royal Hotel brought the proceedings of the conference to a close. The Conference of 1912 will be held at Llandudno.

We append reports of papers read at the conference:

NEW IDEAS AND IDEALS OF MUSIC TEACHING.

Professor Niecks said that the new ideas and ideals he had in view were ear-training, finger and breathing exercises as a preparation for artistic training in playing and singing, scientific theories and methods of musical technique, the study of musical appreciation and the psychology of teaching. The present state, as well as the history of music teaching, was full of startlingly curious facts; one of the most extraordinary was that till recently the ears of those who studied the art of sounds were never cultivated. There had been ear-training of a kind but not ear-culture. Much had been done by the rise of Tonic Sol-fa in this country, and the Galin-Chévé-Paris numerical system in France. The disclaim in which the former was long held by English musicians was largely due to the narrow-mindedness of its earlier exponents. The time had arrived when ear-training should become an integral part of all music-teaching from the first to the last lesson, whether the teaching be vocal, instrumental, or so-called theoretical. The recent change for the better might be dated from the publication at Paris

WORKINGTON (CUMBERLAND).

January 2, 3.

The Cumberland musical festival was held for the thirty-sixth time on the above dates. It is the oldest gathering of its kind in England. Not that musical competitions had never been previously held in this country outside Wales, for the national music meetings held at the Crystal Palace in the early seventies preceded the establishment of the Workington scheme. This Cumberland event owed its origin to the late Mr. Ivander Griffiths, who migrated to Workington from South Wales, and brought his experience of the results of competitions and his fervour for music with him. He was not always adequately supported by the local well-to-do class, perhaps because they did not realise the great social value of the scheme—its mission to bring light and beauty to lowly folk as well as to others more happily circumstanced. Yet Mr. Griffiths persevered with almost pathetic insistence, and with a result that must have yielded untold pleasure and moral profit to thousands of the inhabitants of the district. A memorial preface, contributed to this year's programme by the Rev. Canon Rawnsley, the President of the festival, bears eloquent testimony to the esteem in which Mr. Griffiths was held. The following are quotations:

The amount of labour which he undertook in connection with these yearly festivals at Workington is generally known to his intimate friends, but music with him was its own exceeding reward, and though he was often personally out of pocket by the work he never complained, for he looked upon the work as a mission. He once said that he believed we were all sent into the world with some talent or other to help our time, and he could not have rested with an easy conscience if he had not used the love of music for the helping of the people.

He was a man of great natural refinement and of sanguine temperament and delicate sensibility. The success of the festival seemed to give him new life with which to face the coming year. Few men were so easily moved by kindness and sympathy, and few men felt more than he did an unkind word. He has gone from us, but he has left behind him his Celtic enthusiasm to help the Norsemen of Cumberland to happier days of music and song.

His remains were laid to rest in the old Churchyard of St. John's, Workington, and the town testified to his sense of loss by the presence of its representative at his funeral.

They bore him tenderly to his rest
Where Solway sobs and moves along:
A man whose heart had given its best
To help the brotherhood to song.

The music chosen for competition during a great part of Mr. Griffiths's management was not always calculated to advance the cause of the art. But, as already stated, financial local support was lamentably lacking, and Mr. Griffiths was forced to appeal to music publishers to provide prizes, with the result that tests of a very poor quality were often dictated by the donors as a condition of their support. To some extent there is still this dependence and submission, but it is not likely to continue. All committees should be free to choose just the pieces they want for the education of their competitors, and if after that the publishers choose to give prizes as part of their mission to encourage musical study, that is their affair. In this connection it should be recorded that this year's test programme was generally regarded as the best that has ever been submitted at a Workington festival.

This year's syllabus provided for the following classes: Pianoforte (four grades); violin (three grades); violoncello; cornet; junior solo-singing (four classes); adult solo-singing (seven classes); duets and quartets (four classes); junior choirs (three classes); female-voice, male-voice, and mixed-voice choirs. The entries were numerous, especially in the solo classes. The first day's judging absorbed about nine hours, and the second day's nearly as much time. Miscellaneous concerts, interspersed with competitions, filled the evenings. Miss Gertrude Haworth was the professional soloist on both occasions, and she greatly pleased the audiences. The official accompanists, Mrs. F. Wynn and Miss G. M. Morgan, who worked so hard and ably, deserve special mention.

The choral classes excited the widest interest. In the principal mixed-voice section, in which the tests were the glee (arranged) 'Wide o'er the brim' (Clarke-Whitefield), and the 'Dawn of song' (Bairstow), two choirs appeared out of the three that entered. Both sang these fairly stiff pieces admirably. Seaton (Mr. T. Dixon) came out first, but Haverigg (Mr. H. G. Cook) was close behind.

In the male-voice choir class the tests were: 'Peace and war' (A. Dard-Janin) and 'The witch' (MacDowell), both of which depend upon dramatic interpretation and are calculated to try the mettle of the best choirs. The MacDowell piece has not been used in this country so much as it deserves to be. It is peculiarly characteristic of the genius of its gifted composer, now, alas! no longer with us. Only two choirs appeared. Both exhibited their ability to cope with the difficulties of the tests and to give fine interpretations. The Milton choir (Mr. H. G. Cook) was first with 140 marks out of 160, and Whitehaven (Mr. Woolledge) gained 138 marks. Two well-equipped female-voice choirs came forward to sing 'The Nix' (W. Berger), and 'Dawn' (Percy Buck). Both of these present musical difficulties and demand subtlety of treatment. They were bravely and effectively sung by Haverigg (Mr. H. G. Cook) and Lamplugh (Mr. C. Hales), a slight superiority of the first-named giving them the first place. Four church and chapel choirs appeared in another section, in which the tests were 'Not unto us, O Lord' (Dupuis) and 'The last wild rose' (G. A. Macfarren). The singing showed intelligence on the part of conductors and choralsists. Workington Wesleyans (Mr. J. Hanna) gained the first position, and the Workington Primitive Methodists (Mr. F. Dobie) came second. The other choirs were Cleator Moor Congregational (Mr. W. R. Franklin) and Lamplugh Church (Mr. C. Hales).

There were two sections for children's choirs. In one there was but a single entry. The tests were 'Hark! hark! away' (Birch) and 'Mister Nobody' (Percy C. Buck). Cleator Moor Congregational children (Mr. W. R. Franklin) sang both pieces nicely, but with hardly sufficient vitality. The other class was for boys' choirs, the test-piece being 'The echoing green' (C. V. Stanford); St. James's, Whitehaven, boys' (Mr. W. Barnes) came first. The other choir came from St. Michael's, Workington (Mr. J. Gilmour).

In the solo classes a notable result was the victory of Mr. J. Lackinson, of Workington, in both bass and baritone classes. The test in the latter class was Davidson Arnott's stirring setting of Browning's words, 'Give a rouse.' There were some fine performances of 'The heart's awakening' (A. W. Ketelbey) in the mezzo-soprano class, Miss Mary Rowitt, of Westfield, winning the prize against nine other competitors. Mr. Andrew Downing, of Barrow, gained the chief pianoforte prize by his intelligent interpretation of Rachmaninoff's 'Prelude in C sharp minor, and Miss Charlotte Douglas, of Workington, was first in another class. Randegger's expressive song, 'At night,' was the test for boys, and Alan Fleetham won. The girls sang Schubert's 'Wild rose,' and Elsie Whitehead gave a charming performance which placed her first.

The arrangements are in the hands of a capable committee, the honorary secretary of which is Mr. Stephen Jones, a local solicitor. There are twenty-seven vice-presidents, all men of considerable social standing, but most of them merely thus show their moral sympathy and approval of the work. What the committee most need is the addition of substantial support.

CLEVELAND.—January 2, 3.

This 'Eisteddfod' reached its thirtieth year with every evidence of prosperity and progress, as shown by an increased entry and general satisfaction with the musical results expressed by Mr. Harry Evans, the adjudicator. The winners in the chief solo classes were the following:

- Violin (junior)—Miss Annie Davies.
- „ (senior)—Mr. W. A. Tweddle.
- Pianoforte (junior)—Miss Edna Oldham.
- „ (senior)—Miss Annie Little.
- Girls' singing—Miss Cissie Sykes.
- Boys' „ Mr. J. P. Birkbeck.
- Soprano (20 entries)—Miss Nadin.
- Alto (27 entries)—Miss Blanche Humble.
- Tenor (32 entries)—Mr. William Beverley.
- Bass (39 entries)—Mr. George Kay.

The lack of support given to the children's competitions by school teachers was the one unsatisfactory feature of the festival, although the quality of the singing, especially in the two-part section, was good. Only one party, Middlesbrough St. Philomena's (Miss Mabel Lorkey), entered in the action-song class; one school, Guisborough Providence Girls', provided the only two choirs that entered for sight-singing. In the class for three-part choral singing (under fifty voices, age under sixteen), the test was Dr. Walford Davies's 'The Shepherd,' and the result as follows:

- 1st. Guisborough Providence Girls' (Miss A. A. Goodwill).
- 2nd. Middlesbrough St. Philomena's (Miss Mabel Lorkey).

The same two schools gained the third and second places respectively in the two-part competition (under twenty voices, age under thirteen), for which the test was Myles B. Foster's 'The dewdrop's folly.' The first place was secured by Middlesbrough Crescent Road (Miss Ruth Dawson).

The tests, entries, and results in the adult choral competitions were as follows:

CHURCH CHOIRS (30 to 40 voices).

- Tests: (a) 'How lovely are the messengers' (Mendelssohn); (b) 'O gladsome Light' (Sullivan).
- 3rd. Middlesbrough Woodlands Road Wesleyan

(Mr. W. Cannell).

- 1st. Starbeck Primitive Methodist (Mr. F. Godley).
- West Hartlepool Christ Church (Mr. M. W. Wright).
- 2nd. West Hartlepool St. Oswald's (Mr. E. V. Pickersgill).

MIXED-VOICE CHOIRS (30 to 40 voices).

- Tests: (a) 'Allen-a-Dale' (C. H. Lloyd); (b) 'Weary wind of the West' (Elgar).
- 2nd. Benwell (Mr. Neil M. Boyd).

Cleveland Harmonic (Mr. Gavin Kay).

W. E. Bishop's Select Choir, Darlington.

(Mr. W. E. Bishop).

- 1st. Consett and District (Mr. G. P. Stephenson).

MALE-VOICE CHOIRS (30 to 40 voices).

- Tests: (a) 'The Word went forth' (Mendelssohn);

(b) 'Must I then part from thee?' (F. Otto).

Hartlepool Excelsior (Mr. A. J. Smith).

South Bank (Mr. Ernest Dallimore).

- 1st. Middlesbrough Apollo (Mr. Thomas Nicholas).

North Ormesby (Mr. Leonard Williams).

Cleveland Harmonic (Mr. Gavin Kay).

Darlington (Mr. J. Lin J. Wedgewood).

COLWYN BAY.

January 2.

Mr. J. Caradog Roberts adjudicated at the eighteenth annual New Year's Eisteddfod. The chief contest was that for male-voice choirs, in which the tests were 'The rising of the lark' (Roland Rogers) and 'The Crusaders' (Protheroe). Out of four choirs that had entered only two put in an appearance, namely, Ffynongroew (Mr. Joseph Spencer), who won the prize; and Llanfairfechan (Mr. H. G. Jones). The classes for children's and mixed-voice choirs each attracted one entry from Penrhynside. The chief solo prize-winners were T. I. Hughes (pianoforte), Mrs. Lees (soprano), Mrs. Lewis (contralto), Mr. David Jones (tenor) and Mr. Frank Nicholson (baritone).

BRAMLEY SALEM.

January 21.

The seventh annual festival for juniors was held here with success. The entries were as follows: Pianoforte, 10; girl soloists, 18; violin, 7; boy soloists, 12; and school choirs, 4. Queen's Road C.S. (Mr. Cockran) was first in the choir class and Lower Wortley Boys' C.S. (Mr. T. Martin) was second. Mr. Julian Clifford (the Harrogate conductor) was the adjudicator.

THE WHARFEDALE (ILKLEY) COMPETITION.

The report of last year's operations is issued with the syllabus for the festival to be held on May 11, 12, and 13. The following are extracts:

The continued success of our festival is a matter for hearty congratulation: year by year the entries are increasing, and year by year a better class of candidate is competing. This is especially noticeable in the open classes: candidates are entering from a wider area, and this incursion has a good reflex action on the work of the local candidates, because it enables useful comparisons to be made. Under these circumstances it is very gratifying to know that in two of the open classes, local competitors have beaten all comers for the second year in succession.

So great was the number of candidates this year, that an additional session was found necessary, making nine sessions in all, as against eight sessions in 1909 and six sessions in 1908.

Increased interest has been shown by the heads of elementary schools, and some very satisfactory results were obtained in the ear-test competition from the pupils of the Church of England Girls' School, Ilkley. In order to still further encourage the interest of the elementary school teachers, the executive committee is prepared to make grants towards the expenses of competitors from elementary schools. In each case the application must be made by the head-master or head-mistress.

The Girls' Clubs are beginning to realise the usefulness of the competition movement. It is a direct incentive for the vocal members to study good music and to practise regularly; this year we had two entries as against one last year. It is hoped additional Clubs will join the movement next year, when a special class will be included for junior members of Girls' Clubs.

With regard to the other choral classes, complete success has crowned our efforts. Both in the local and the open classes satisfactory entries were received, and highly gratifying results were achieved by the competing choirs; the choral culture gained by the choirs through these competitions is working for untold good: we are not only developing the technical side of the many choirs, but we are at the same time developing their taste by giving them only the very best music to sing.

There is a strange apathy amongst local church and chapel choirs. The committee would heartily welcome more competitors in this class.

The general public have shown keen interest in our work, and there is no doubt they are becoming alive to the educational advantages of this movement; they are unconsciously learning how to listen to music: the repeated performance of any one piece or song gives them an insight into the composition which they could not obtain in any other way. Then the adjudicator, with his helpful criticism, shows up the sins of commission and the sins of omission. By these means the critical faculty is becoming educated on sound lines, and whilst educating the critical faculty, we are also educating the taste of our audiences; we are helping to form a standard of taste which will help forward the art of music in many different directions.

Finally, we must allude to the financial success of the festival, which was all that could be desired.

The syllabus shows that the tests have been chosen with judgment and care. The names of the pieces are given in each class with no mention of the publishers. The necessary information as to this is given separately at the end of the syllabus. This is a much better arrangement than that usually adopted, where the publishers are named after each item.

THE BLACKSTONE-IPSWICH CAMBRIAN CHOIR (QUEENSLAND).

In our last issue we recorded the success, at Sydney, of the Blackstone-Ipswich Cambrian Choir. The annual report of this organization has just reached us. We give a few extracts to show the extent of the choir's operations. The first paragraph we quote will serve to help to dissipate the idea some half-informed critics of the competition movement have that all competitive choirs grind at a few part-songs all the year round:

In addition to the work entailed by the competitive festivals, the choir prepared a heavy programme of concert work. For our second concert the works performed were Mendelssohn's 'Hear my prayer' and '42nd Psalm,' and Stanford's 'Revenge,' which were rendered with full orchestral accompaniment. This programme proved so acceptable that your committee would express the hope that the choir may be able to render at least one programme of similar works annually.

The year's financial statement is submitted herewith, and members will find particulars of receipts and disbursements therein. The year's income is the highest in the history of the choir, amounting to £1,139 9s., while the gross expenditure has been £1,022 0s. 11d., thus showing a credit balance on the year's transactions of £117 8s. 1d. It is a noticeable feature that our chief source of income for some years past has been prize-money won in competitions. Though we are able to present a satisfactory financial statement, your committee do not lose sight of the fact that our chief source of income as detailed therein cannot be regarded as permanent, and think, having regard to the excellence of the concerts submitted by the choir for some considerable time past, it should be possible to secure a sufficiently large number of annual subscribers of £1 1s. to enable your committee to finance the ordinary expenditure of the choir. In terms of the rules of the choir such subscribers would receive three tickets for each of three concerts annually. We would urge that this matter be taken up earnestly by the members and the incoming committee, and would suggest that a prospectus might be issued with advantage.

Your committee have carefully considered the future work of the choir, particularly in view of the high standard now attained in choral singing, and are of opinion that the further advancement of the Society must lie to a very great extent along the lines of individual voice cultivation. We suggest that this result might best be obtained by the institution of a number of scholarships or bursaries available to a number of each section of the choir or by a course of class tuition. This suggestion we submit for the earnest consideration of members, and trust the committee to be elected for the ensuing year will be empowered to take some definite steps in regard thereto.

Suggestions have been made in the Southern States as to the possibility of an Australian Choir touring in England and America and competing in the musical competitions there, and your committee have taken steps to have the undoubted claims of this choir to prior consideration duly recognised should any definite claim for Government assistance in such a project be advanced.

Mr. Leonard Francis, the conductor, is now on a visit to this country. We regret to say that immediately on his arrival he had to undergo an operation for appendicitis, from the effects of which we are glad to state he has happily recovered.

SCHOOL CHOIR COMPETITIONS IN CAPE COLONY.

The Education Gazette for December, 1909, gives elaborate official accounts of competitions in eight districts. The following is a compressed report:

KAROO SHIELD.

The competition was held in two centres, Murraysburg and Prince Albert counting as one event. The audiences at both places were most enthusiastic. The prescribed test was 'Excelsior,' by Mr. J. F. Proudan. Own-choice pieces were 'Creation's Hymn' (Beethoven), 'O wert thou in the cauld blast' (Mendelssohn) and 'When hands meet' (Pinsuti). Sight-tests were in unison and two parts. The Murraysburg Public School (Miss E. Rademeyer) gained the shield.

NGANAKWE.

Five native school choirs competed in the court house. The prescribed test was 'The Carnovale' (Rossini), and the own-choice pieces were 'Song of the gipsies' (Seward); 'Hark! Apollo' (Bishop); 'Let me, careless' (Linley); and 'Italian salad' (Gence). All the songs were attempted in four parts (S.A.T.B.), after the usual manner of native choirs. The air of Stevens's, 'The cloud-capt towers,' was taken as the unison sight-test, the two-part test being supplied by the department.

We gather that the Ezolo Choir sang the 'Italian salad,' a very long piece, from memory.

RAILWAY SCHOOLS CHOIR COMPETITION.

Held at De Aar, on November 19, this event attracted three choirs, De Aar Public School, Naauwpoort and Touws River. The prescribed test was Mendelssohn's 'Fair-tinted primrose'; the own-choice pieces of the above schools were respectively: 'Sleep, gentle lady' (H. R. Bishop); 'Cherry ripe' (E. C. Horn); and 'Hope will banish sorrow' (Swabian folk-song).

Naauwpoort (Mr. R. B. Smith) were declared winners.

BUTTERWORTH.

The first of three competitions for native schools of Fingo-land took place here on November 1. The prescribed test was Festa's 'Down in a flow'ry vale.' The entering choirs and their own-choice pieces were:—

Ndabakazi (Mr. Martin Mpondo.)
Cherry ripe ... ..	Horn.
Veldman's (Mr. Charles Ndwandwa.)
All hail, thou queen of night ...	Martin.
Butterworth (Mr. Edward T. Bala.)
Fisherman's good-night ...	Bishop.

Veldman's were best in both this and the sight-singing contest, and gained the shield.

TSOMO NATIVE CHOIR.

This competition was held on November 18 in the grounds of the public school, Tsomo. We give the list of choirs and conductors, because the spelling of the various names affords interesting evidence of the nationality of those concerned: Lutuli (Titus Tsoti); Caba (Matthias Nonkanyana); Esiqubudwini (Gershom Koyana); Hange (Samuel Ncobo); Tshangani's (Edmund Masiza); Tsomo (Edmund Mboniswa). The prescribed test was 'The cloud-capt towers' (Stevens). The own-choice pieces were: 'O mistress mine' (Stevens), 'The rose maiden' (Cowen), 'The fisherman' (Congreve), 'How blissful the meeting' (Donizetti), 'Come, Dorothy, come' (Swabian folk-song), 'Away, away, in early day' (arr. from Webbe). The Tshangani school was awarded the first place.

CERES, MONTAGUE, ROBERTSON AND WORCESTER.

The competition for mission school choirs in the above districts was held at Worcester, on November 17, in the Rhenish Church, before a good audience that included several of the leading citizens. The prescribed song was 'Violets' (F. H. Cowen), and the own-choice pieces were 'Song of the Veld' (Carey) and 'The Lord is my Shepherd' (Bargiel). The Rhenish Mission School, Worcester, was awarded the first prize. An elaborate ear-test, which consisted of a melody of sixty-two notes, was correctly written by Johanna Fiansman and Helen Daniels.

ST. MARK'S NATIVE CHOIRS.

This event was held in the Court House, Cofimvaba, on November 9. Eleven schools took part. The test-piece was 'It was a lover and his lass' (Cheshire). The own-choice pieces were: 'Merry comrades' (Becker); 'Mighty Norseman'; 'Up, away' (Becker); 'O hush thee' (Sullivan); 'Cherry ripe' (Horn); 'On the banks of Allan Water'; 'Awake, Æolian lyre' (Danby); 'Hark! sweet voices' (Trimmell); 'Drink to me only'; 'A shower' (Root); 'Who is Sylvia?' (Morley). The report does not state which choir won the first place, but it places Woodhouse Forests first in a list of best choirs.

ERGOBOBO NATIVE CHOIRS.

This competition was heard in two places, eight at Clarkebury and six at the Residency. Fourteen schools sent choirs. The prescribed test was 'Parting' (Mendelssohn). The own-choice pieces were: 'Merry mill-wheel' (Seward); 'The skylark's song' (Mendelssohn); 'I'll live for thee' (Dunbar); 'Come where the sunlight sleepeth' (Emerson); 'Around the hearth' (Perkins); 'O we are skaters bold' (Fillmore); 'Alpine wooer'; 'Absence' (Hatton); 'Merrily on we go'; 'My dream' (Seward); 'Who is Sylvia' (Morley); 'Morning prayer' (Mendelssohn); 'The frost' (Root); 'The cuckoo' (Gersbach). The shield was awarded to the Cweeweni choir (James Tuta).

LANCASTER.

CONCERT BY MR. ALDOUS'S CHOIR.

We include in our Record an account of the concert given by the choir on January 18, because it will serve to show that a famous competitive organization does something besides competing. The choral items at this concert included the following choice pieces:

Madrigal, 'Nymphs and shepherds' ...	Marson.
Choral Songs—'Go, song of mine' ...	Elgar.
'In the silent West' ...	Bantock.
Chanson—'Cold Winter' ...	Claude Debussy.
Part-song—'The shepherd's waking' ...	Fanning.
Pieces for female voices—
'Serenade' ...	Schubert.
'A June Rose' ...	Coleridge-Taylor.
'Ophelia' ...	Berlioz.

Mr. J. W. Aldous conducted.

in 1882 of Lavignani's 'Complete Theoretical and Practical Course of Musical Dictation,' and was exemplified by such English books as those by Sedley Taylor, John Taylor, Ritter, Sawyer, and Shinn.

The teacher's foremost duty was to awaken, stimulate, and guide the pupil's power of observation; this would lead to thinking, sub-conscious as well as conscious. There was no more important point to which the attention ought to be drawn than to the tonal relations and the characteristics of the scale notes. If these were once fully felt and understood, the battle was as good as won. In the learning of these relations, cleverly contrived syllables, figures and other mnemonic aids could play a useful part, but they were means, not ends. Professor Niecks then dealt with absolute pitch, which he considered largely a gift and partly cultivable. He said the sense of absolute pitch had a harassing enemy in the variability of tuning. A well-developed sense of relative pitch was indispensable to a musician. He went on to discuss dictation lessons, which led into the subject of rhythm. This was another neglected department of ear-training. The extent to which rhythm stood in need of cultivation was heard every day, not only in the performances of pupils, amateurs and inferior musicians, but even in those of famous virtuosos. Professor Niecks alluded to the 'Rhythmical Gymnastics' of the Swiss, Jacques-Dalcroze, whose method had met with success in Switzerland and Germany and was making headway in France. He described the working of the system towards its object of 'developing the sense of musical metric and musical rhythm and the sense of plastic harmony and the equipoise of movements for the regulation of motor habits,' and quoted the following dicta of the author of the system. 'Rhythmical Gymnastics have for their object the perfecting of strength and suppleness of the muscles in the proportions of time and space, music and plastic art.' 'To regulate and perfect the movements is tantamount to educating the mind to rhythm.'

Professor Niecks then turned to the consideration of finger gymnastics, mentioning systems that had been put forward during the last half-century, and passed on to technique. The latest theories on this subject, especially as regards pianoforte technique, amounted, he said, to a revolution. He attached chief importance to the works of Steinhausen (pianoforte and violin) and Breithaupt (pianoforte) in Germany, and Matthay (pianoforte) in England. He said: 'The innovators plead for a technique in accordance with the natural physiological conditions. They do not say that they have invented a new method, but that they teach what the virtuosos of genius have instinctively practised and the schools ignored. The new way reverses the old way of teaching. Formerly finger and wrist gymnastics were the beginning and end of technique. Now we are told that the activity of the hand should be as little as possible, and the only actively guiding movement that of the upper-arm. The upper-arm and shoulder are the suppliers of energy, the forearm and hand the conductors of it. It is a mistake to execute all possible operations of the upper limbs with little limited movement, instead of with large sweeping movements. Breithaupt sets aside finger work altogether, and substitutes the swinging whole as a form of technique. Do not think of fingers, do not try to play with them, is the supreme principle. The notes have, as it were, to be shaken out of the player's sleeve. For mechanical reasons the mass of the hand or of a finger can never be set in motion separately, the whole mass of the arm being always implicated in the act of touch. Matthay, in this respect heterodox, speaks, however, of isolated finger, hand, and arm movement. Important features of the new natural technique are: muscular relaxation and elasticity, utilisation of arm-weight, rotary movement of the forearm, also of the upper-arm, swinging or slinging movement of the arm, and vibratory movement of the upper-arm.'

In dealing with appreciation-study, Professor Niecks praised the work of Mr. Stewart Macpherson. If such study were conducted only through courses of harmony, counterpoint, form, instrumentation and aesthetics, there would, he said, be little hope of the world becoming widely appreciative of the beauties of music, although the subjects mentioned were indispensable. Conscious analysis while hearing a work, interlarded with the æsthetic impression. The study of harmony, form, &c., was not for use during hearing, but a preparatory discipline to enable the mind to hear well. Many thousands of people who could or would not go through such a discipline and yet loved and wanted to understand music could be helped by being made to notice, and by being told what to listen for. One could point out to them beauty of melodic lines and harmonic and contrapuntal combinations, the nature of musical form and the infinite variety of expression in music. This could be done without distressing them with perplexing technicalities.

The psychology a teacher required, said Professor Niecks, was a natural and practical psychology. A book like William James's 'Talks to teachers on psychology' outweighed half-a-dozen systematic treatises, and even hand-books specially written for teachers.

NATIONAL OPERA.

Mr. Manners said that the words National Opera were loosely used to designate Opera in English, performances of English Operas, or Opera for the nation. What he had in view was Opera of any nationality, written in English or translated into English, carried out with the first idea in the manager's head to cultivate, help, encourage and give as much as he consistently could of operas written by British composers, and with the best chance given to British artists. This he called Empire Opera. He looked forward to the time when it would be given regularly in every large town in the Kingdom and all parts of the Empire. He suggested the institution of three companies: 'A' for the largest towns; 'B,' with a less advanced repertory and working on a smaller scale, to visit smaller towns; 'C,' to do missionary work elsewhere. He commended efforts made to spread a knowledge of the plots of operas beforehand, and attributed the popularity of such operas as 'Faust' and 'The Bohemian girl' to the fact that in the process of years people have really got to know what the story is. Mr. Manners said that there were immense possibilities for opera in Great Britain, but there was great need of groundwork in operatic education before they could be realised. It was necessary to begin at the beginning and educate the public in easy stages, that people might go to the opera because they loved it as the outcome of understanding it. As regards artists, Mr. Manners was of opinion that there were better voices in Great Britain than in any other country in the world. The competitive festivals revealed what a wealth of vocal talent the country possessed. The difficulty was that English singers were impatient of slow progress, and wished to undertake heavy tasks without first acquiring the necessary experience. Mr. Manners then formulated an elaborate scheme for Opera as a national institution. It was to be run on business-like methods. Towns were to prepare for the arrival of a company by making known its repertory, the names of the singers, &c., and obtaining a sufficient number of applications for seats as an essential preliminary. Orchestras should be constituted on the basis of severe examination, and should form a body at the service of the organizers of concerts and festivals. Music students in the towns visited, both in the Kingdom and in the Colonies, should be prepared in the music schools to undertake small parts or chorus work during the visit of the company. Other suggestions were made in the same connection. As a test for the feasibility of the plan to institute national opera, Mr. Manners proposed: to found a limited liability company of 100,000 shares of half-a-crown each; to give the services of himself and his wife as managers; to carry on the undertaking for three years: if at the end of that period the position was satisfactory, to ask for State support. He would limit the holdings to one share per person, as shareholders would then forego dividends.

Mr. de Lafontaine spoke at great length and with an abundance of interesting detail upon Spain, her people, her folk-music, her composers and their music, and Spanish musical institutions. Mr. Rogers read an important paper on the history of our chief musical festivals, described their characteristics, and discussed the purpose, prospects and ideals of musical festivals in general. We regret that space will not permit of a report of these papers in our present issue.

Mr. W. H. Parker, organist of Aylesbury Parish Church, has been appointed conductor of the Vale of Aylesbury Harmonic Society.

SHEFFIELD FESTIVAL CHORUS.

PRESENTATION TO DR. COWARD.

For the fourth time in his career, Dr. Henry Coward has been the recipient of a presentation from his fellow-musicians in the city of Sheffield. This latest token of honour and esteem to the eminent chorus-master, which took place at the Masonic Hall, Sheffield, on January 13, was the corollary of his recent resignation from the post of choir-trainer of the Sheffield Festival Chorus, a position he has held since the first festival in 1896. When the forthcoming music-making falls due, at the end of April, Dr. Coward will be far afield with his choir on a six months' tour to America and the Colonies.

Mr. T. Walter Hall, chairman of the executive committee, who occupied the chair, was supported by Mr. Willoughby Firth and Mr. Noel W. Burbidge, joint honorary secretaries of the festival. The Duke of Norfolk, who had hoped to attend and make the presentation, was at the last moment detained in London. He wrote a cordial letter, in the course of which he said of Dr. Coward: 'He has brought Sheffield to the front rank in the musical world, and he has implanted in the minds of the people of Sheffield a high appreciation of all that music means, and a conscious pride in the success which the city has attained.'

Sir Henry Wood, who was present, paid a generous tribute to the life-work of the hero of the gathering. Colonel Hughes, on behalf of the Duke of Norfolk, then asked Dr. Coward to accept the gift—a set of four fine pictures by well-known local artists.

Dr. Coward responded in a characteristic speech. He said he was glad to be assured that the splendid gift was not to be regarded as a valetudinary one. The gathering was a memorable occasion.

BRITISH MUSIC ON THE CONTINENT.

MACKENZIE'S 'THE SUN-GOD'S RETURN,' AT VIENNA.

Herr A. J. von Eisner Eisenhof, head of the Singakademie, writes to us as follows:

Sir Alexander C. Mackenzie's cantata 'The Sun-God's return,' produced at the Cardiff festival in September last, and since then performed by the Sheffield Musical Union, has had its third performance under the name 'Des Sonnengott's Heimkehr,' at the Grosser Musikverein Saal, in Vienna. Joseph Bennett's stirring poem has been translated by Dr. Wilhelm Heuzen very creditably. We must say that this work is the composer's crowning achievement. The chorus-parts are not at all easy, but make a great effect when they are mastered. Although the work is full of melody, it is a modern work. Viennese critics say it is done in the Wagnerian manner, but in all senses it is good. Certainly the treatment is entirely modern. In the second scene, Helheim, Mackenzie has not disdained to use the brush of the impressionist, and has used it with great success. The solo parts are strenuous but most telling. The whole work is surely a real 'Meisterwerk,' and written in the spirit of youth. The choral forces were those of the Wiener Singakademie, and the orchestra was that of the Orchester-Verein. They both did their work admirably, earning the full appreciation of Sir Alexander Mackenzie, who conducted, for the excellent manner in which his exacting orchestration and choral writing were reproduced. The choir of the celebrated Wiener Singakademie had been prepared with great zeal by the musical director, Herr Richard Wickenhauser, who gracefully handed his baton to the composer. The choir, numbering 250 voices, received Sir A. C. Mackenzie with much enthusiasm at the rehearsals, and he expressed himself in terms of high approbation with regard to the manner in which his work had been prepared. The orchestra also earned the composer's hearty praise. Madame Kiurina and her husband, two prominent artists from the Imperial Opera House, were both excellent, and undertook the strenuous principal rôles with great success, while the small but very important part of the Queen was admirably sung by Madame Martinez, a prominent member of the Wiener Singakademie. Sir Alexander may be very proud of the great success he earned in Vienna. The whole occasion was quite a social event. The Minister of Culture and Instruction, Count Stürgkh, the Ambassador, Sir E. G. Cartwright, and Lady Cartwright, were present at the performance. The Protector Archduchess Isabelle was ill, and she sent as her representative her daughter, Her Imperial and Royal Highness Princess Maria Anna of Parma, who expressed a desire to make Sir Alexander's acquaintance, and had words of very sincere admiration for the eminent composer. We were all glad and proud to have been the first public which applauded Sir Alexander Mackenzie, and we all look forward to seeing him again in our country.

ELGAR'S SYMPHONY AT CREFELD.

The Symphony was performed at Crefeld, as reported on page 17 of our last issue, by Herr Müller-Reuter's orchestra under the composer's direction. We quote some opinions that appeared in the German Press:

'In the first place the thematic development of the work earns our admiration. . . . The orchestration and colouring are above praise. The composer shows himself the absolute master of the advanced means of musical expression that we owe to Wagner and Liszt.'—Niederrheinische Volkszeitung.

'It is a work of beautiful and homogeneous construction and architectural design. The movements are not isolated efforts, as in the case of some epigrammatic works of the greatest masters, but are related to the whole by their moods and thematic connection.'—Krefelder Zeitung.

'Much has been said for and against this work, with which, I must admit, I was fascinated. Few compositions equal it in bigness and high workmanship. Elgar likes contrasts—Hades and Olympia, Hell and Walhalla. The second movement might be called Demons and Graces. The third movement, with its broad sonorous melody, reminds one of Tchaikovsky. The last movement has finely-conceived modulations and a brilliant Finale. The whole work left an impression of mastery, and was no small triumph for Elgar.'—Kölnische Zeitung.

ELGAR'S VIOLIN CONCERTO.

This work has been twice performed on the Continent by Herr Kreisler, with Herr J. W. Mengelberg as conductor. Both events were great popular successes. At Amsterdam, on January 13, the orchestra was that of the Concertgebouw. The Telegraaf said: 'Elgar is above all melodious; his thematic material is rich and skilfully developed. He has a personality of his own.' The Handelsblad said: 'The Violin concerto again reveals Elgar's surpassing orchestration.' The second Continental performance took place on January 20, at a Museumskonzert at Frankfurt-on-the-Main.

ROYAL INSTITUTION.

The annual series of six Christmas lectures for young people was delivered by Professor Silvanus Thompson, whose topic was 'Sound, musical and non-musical.' His lucid explanations and copious elaborate experiments, often with apparatus of a homely character, brought the subject within everybody's comprehension, even in some of its highly technical and abstruse developments. 'At the first lecture he dealt with the production of sound, having first described the human ear. He demonstrated the difference between the regular vibrations which caused musical sound and the irregular vibrations which caused unmusical sound, showed how the setting-up of air vibrations could cause sounds in various unexpected ways, and drove home his remarks in a way that was continuously practical and interesting. At the second lecture he dealt similarly with the transmission of sound; at the third, during which he used an enormous model ear, with the reception of sound; at the remainder, with the combination, registration and reproduction of sounds.'

THE PALLADIUM.

It is a sign of the times that the increasing demand for music that deserves to be called music has penetrated into the music-hall world, and made its influence felt in the plans of a few—very few—managers. If up to now the visible result is small and uncertain, we can at least be thankful for small beginnings. In its second week of existence the Palladium, which is not too mean to be a Valhalla of all the Arts (represented at present chiefly by architecture, dancing and limelight-manipulation), was for a few minutes in each programme the home of Wagner and other opera. Miss Edyth Walker was the chief exponent, and her assistants were Mr. James Sale (conductor) and an orchestra that was admirably fitted to carry out the other part of their duties. The programme announced that 'the creator of the opera season's success—Elektra' would render scenes from the following operas:—'Die Lustige Weibe von Windsor,' 'Tannhäuser,' 'The Marriage of Figaro,' 'Rienzi' and 'Eglantine from 'Euryanthe.' At the opening performance it was left to the critics and a few more of the elect to discern that the opera chosen was 'Rienzi,' and that the particular excerpt was Adriano's air, a piece of music of no absorbing interest either to the educated or to the uneducated ear. Miss Walker appeared in a dim-lit glade in knight's costume, and sang in German. The effect presented to the vast majority of the audience was doubtless that of a male person, for reasons unknown in a state of great agitation, vocalising a none-too-catchy tune in a glorious female voice. However much or little they were disturbed by conjecture, the listeners appeared to like the performance immensely, and accordingly Miss Walker, holding a cloak over her male attire, returned and sang them 'The lost chord.'

Thus our poor suffering muse entered into her new palace bound with heavy shackles and hedged in with obstacles. Yet her sway was felt, and according to report it has since grown stronger and surer. We heard later that Miss Walker was called before the curtain an innumerable number of times after each performance. On the afternoon of January 2, when the above event took place, nothing in the whole entertainment was more artistic, refined, and likely to elevate the public taste than an exquisite stately dance done by children in the course of the ballet 'Yuletide revels.'

THE SOUSA BAND.

It is five years since John Philip Sousa and his players were in England, and although his compositions may have retained their popularity, his fame as an executant of them is much diminished, and it may be doubted that many heart-strings will burn in England at the announcement that he intends to retire from his work as a conductor. He is signalling the event with characteristic American downrightness by taking his band on a tour of the world. This tour opened with a week's concert-giving in London from January 2 to January 7, during which he presented two programmes a day at Queen's Hall. It was almost a welcome disappointment to find that the common talk of his eccentricities as a conductor was exaggerated, or no longer tallied with his methods. His gestures were certainly unconventional, but they were for the greater part restrained and directed more towards musical effect than ostentation. The most important and serious item in the opening programme was Liszt's symphonic poem 'Les préludes,' which was played with excellent effect in spite of the obvious disadvantages involved in the transcription. Sousa's own compositions were naturally given a prominent place, and none could complain of this, for in their own sphere they are works of genius, and they are unquestionably the best medium for showing off the qualities of the Sousa band. Their orchestration is often of superb effectiveness. Some of Sousa's ideas in this connection are entirely his own. Not even Strauss has discovered the variety that can be imparted to a colour-scheme by shifting players, or groups of players, from one position on the platform to another. During the performance of a familiar Sousa march, six cornets stepped forward to the front of the platform and gave their best to the audience, playing the tune as a kind of canto fermo; shortly, six trombones ranged themselves alongside and fulminated a counterpoint beneath; then piccolos stationed themselves on the other side and added a free part above, and meanwhile the remainder of the band carried on the strenuous life. The total result was a sufficient excuse for any inaccuracies in the description. Throughout the programme it was made clear that the executive ability of Sousa's instrumentalists and the exhilarating rhythm of their playing were all that expectation had promised. Solos were given by Miss Virginia Root (soprano), Miss Nicholine Zedeler (violin), and Mr. Herbert L. Clarke (cornet). The concerts were fairly well supported during the week by the public, but they failed to take London by storm.

QUEEN'S HALL CHORAL SOCIETY.

PRODUCTION OF 'GOLGOTHA.'

At the third concert of the season, given on January 17, Mr. Franco Leoni's new sacred work 'Golgotha' was produced for the first time. Mr. Leoni is already known as a composer of music to sacred words by his cantata 'The Gate of Life,' but he has given his attention mostly to dramatic music, for the writing of which, as 'Golgotha' testifies, he has many qualifications. The words of the new work are taken from the New Testament, and are divided into three sections dealing respectively with the Betrayal, the Trial and the Crucifixion of Christ. The narrative form is followed, but occasionally there are personal utterances, inevitable from the nature of the text. Six soloists are required.

The idiom and general character of Mr. Leoni's music provokes doubt as to its appropriateness to the transcendently solemn topics with which it is associated. No one steeped in Bach is likely to be deeply impressed by 'Golgotha.' But on the other hand it must be admitted that an artist must before all things be sincere, and present the expression of his own point of view in the musical language that is natural to him. There is much to attract in the work as abstract music. The orchestration is full of colour, with a distinct leaning to effects of the scintillating order. The choral part is often dramatically effective, and one or two of the climaxes are powerful. The last section displays some fitting dignity of treatment. The work enjoyed the advantage of an excellent performance under the composer's own direction. The choir of 200 voices showed considerable capacity and skilful training, the orchestra was that of the Queen's Hall, and the soloists were Madame Ada Davies, Miss Alice Prowse, Madame Clara Butt (who was in fine voice), Mr. Gervase Elwes (who sang with moving expression), Mr. Kennerley Rumford and Mr. Herbert Haynes. Mr. F. B. Kiddle was the organist.

The vocal score of 'Golgotha' is printed without key-signatures, the reason for this being that the composer believes that the rapid and distant modulations of modern music are thus easier to read than when the key-signature is constantly upset.

QUEEN'S HALL SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The concert given on January 21, was the first conducted by Sir Henry Wood since he received the honour of knighthood. The audience naturally gave him an especially hearty reception. The programme contained only three items. The first was a Suite for orchestra entitled 'L'Attaque du Moulin,' by Alfred Bruneau. This suite is based upon the opera with this name, composed by Bruneau. It is in three movements, each of which displays the talent of the composer. They are intended as programme music, but they are sufficiently attractive without the thought of a story. M. Jacques Thibaud gave a fine performance of Lalo's 'Symphonie Espagnole,' for violin and orchestra. The last item was Elgar's A flat Symphony, which received an interpretation that was characteristic of Sir Henry Wood's thought-out style. There was a large audience.

QUEEN'S HALL ORCHESTRA.

HERR KREISLER'S CONCERTS.

On December 28, Herr Kreisler gave a concert with the Queen's Hall Orchestra under Mr. Henry Wood (as he then was), for the purpose of again bringing forward the Elgar Violin concerto. It was a bold experiment to include the Brahms Violin concerto in the same programme, but the result justified the risk. Mr. Wood secured a perfectly beautiful performance of the orchestral part: all was so clear and highly finished.

On January 16, Herr Kreisler gave another concert, this time including the Beethoven Concerto as well as that of Elgar in the programme. We are inclined to ask whether on this occasion it was quite fair to the new Concerto, and especially to the vast audience assembled, to place the Beethoven Concerto first? The older work was played simply magnificently, and by its powerful interpretation exhausted, to some extent, the attention of the audience before, late in the afternoon, they were given the Elgar Concerto, to hear which they had travelled from near and far. But notwithstanding all this, the latter work made its usual great effect. Sir Edward Elgar conducted the concert.

LA SOCIÉTÉ DES CONCERTS FRANÇAIS.

The tenth of this Society's concerts took place at Bechstein Hall on January 19. The remarkably skilful and interesting playing of the Parisian Quartet was heard in a Quartet by M. Louis Dumas and César Franck's Pianoforte quintet. In the absence, through illness, of M. Feuillard, the violoncellist of the Quartet, his place was taken by M. Dumas. The Quartet revealed the composer as a disciple, rather than a leader, of the modern French school. He has absorbed their phraseology and employs it with fluency, but has no ideas of striking individuality to express. Songs of varying merit by Albert Bertelin, Louis Aubert and Gabriel Dupont were excellently sung by Madame L. Willaume-Lamber, accompanied by Madame Feuillard. M. Maurice Dumesnil played with excessive rubato (unless the music was intended to be devoid of regular measure) a set of pianoforte pieces entitled 'La maison dans les dunes,' by Gabriel Dupont, and afterwards joined the string players in a striking performance of Franck's work, whose sheer beauty quickly obliterated all other impressions received during the concert.

An 'out-of-series' concert was given on the following afternoon at 'The Limes,' Holland Park Road, by permission of Madame Liotard-Vogt. The interesting features were the presence of M. Maurice Ravel as solo pianist and accompanist in works of his own, and the first performance in London of a Pianoforte quintet by M. Florent Schmitt, a pupil of M. Gabriel Fauré. M. Ravel is a modern among moderns, and his compositions probably provoked more mystification than admiration, although their cleverness was often undeniable. The Quintet is an appealing work of great elaboration and length, and a corresponding wealth of ideas. Its harmonies are advanced without being laboured or uncouth, and the workmanship is masterly.

London Concerts.

ROYAL CHORAL SOCIETY.

The annual performance of 'The Messiah' took place at the Royal Albert Hall on January 2, under the direction of Sir Frederick Bridge. The perennial attraction that the work exercises, especially at Christmas time, over the British public was augmented on this occasion by the presence of Madame Clara Butt as a soloist, after a protracted absence from the concert platform. The result was the largest audience that has attended a concert of the Society for many years. The performance was vigorous and at all points efficient. The other soloists were Madame Gleeson-White, Mr. Ben Davies and Mr. Kennerley Rumford. Mr. H. L. Balfour was at the organ.

THE LONDON CHORAL SOCIETY.

By an inadvertence, the record in our January issue of the concert given by this Society on December 8 was incomplete. It should have been stated that Sir Charles Stanford's five new 'Songs of the Fleet' (which were produced at the recent Leeds Festival) were performed in London for the first time on this occasion. Their success at the Queen's Hall was complete; the audience became unwontedly enthusiastic. Mr. Plunket Greene was the soloist, and Mr. Arthur Fagge conducted. Sir Charles Stanford was present, and was called several times.

Tchaikovsky's 'Symphonie Pathétique' was as usual the feature of the New Year's concert given on December 31 by the Queen's Hall Orchestra, under Sir (then Mr.) Henry Wood. A number of popular Wagner excerpts, together with vocal contributions by Mr. Ben Davies, supplied the remainder of the programme.

On January 12, Miss Gwynne Kimpton gave, at Steinway Hall, the first of a series of orchestral concerts for young people, which proved to be an occasion of unusual interest. The programme, chosen with the object of providing 'music such as children can enjoy and understand,' included Haydn's 'Clock' symphony and Beethoven's 'Prometheus' overture. Opinions differed as to the merits of this selection with a view to its purpose. Two 'Elegiac melodies' and a 'Rigaudon' by Grieg constituted the remainder of the orchestral music, and some Stevenson songs by Mr. Graham Peel, excellently sung by Mr. Campbell McInnes, completed the programme. The orchestra of thirty-six, mostly ladies, was drawn largely from London musical institutions. Before the music was performed, an introductory lecture was given by Dr. Borland, who described the orchestra and explained the nature and functions of the various instruments.

The performance of Sullivan's 'The Golden Legend,' given on January 14 by the Alexandra Palace Choral and Orchestral Society under Mr. Allen Gill, gave pleasure to a large audience. In no way did it fall below the admirable standard of the previous efforts of this organization. The soloists were Miss Ida Kahn, Miss Violet Elliott, Mr. Lloyd Chandos, Mr. Reginald Goud and Mr. Thorpe Bates. Sullivan's work was preceded by Parry's 'Blest pair of Sirens.'

The concert given by the New Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Landon Ronald at Queen's Hall, on January 18, was given up to works by modern foreign composers, among whom the American, F. Converse, received the chief share of attention. His symphonic poem, 'The mystic trumpeter,' after Walt Whitman, was performed for the first time in England and gained general favour for its picturesque and rich harmonic and orchestral colouring rather than for its thematic strength or psychological meaning. It was followed by Grieg's Pianoforte concerto, played by Mr. Lortat Jacob; an agreeable orchestral suite, 'Esquisses Caucasiennes' by M. Ippolitov-Ivanov; Debussy's 'L'après-midi d'un Faune' and Dukas's scherzo 'L'apprenti sorcier.' The orchestra played throughout in a style that accorded with its reputation.

An excellent performance of the concert version of German's opera 'Merrie England' was given by the Central London Choral and Orchestral Society at Queen's Hall, on January 19, under the direction of Mr. David J. Thomas. The chief soloists were Miss Elsie Short, Miss Ruby Cobbett, Madame Beauchamp Northcote, Mr. Hubert Baker and Mr. Evelyn Wood. The remainder of the evening's programme included Mr. Oskar Borsdorf's Concert Overture in D.

RECITALS.

Miss Hélène Martini, a new-comer to England, gave a successful recital at Bechstein Hall on January 17, displaying a pleasant contralto voice, expressive power and linguistic versatility. Mlle. Marta Wittkowska gave a recital at Æolian Hall the same evening, and revealed temperamental qualities in an interesting programme. On January 18, Miss Pauline de Schönberg, in a recital at Æolian Hall, showed herself an apt pupil of Yvette Guilbert; at Bechstein Hall, Miss Ruth Freeman made skilful use of a pleasant soprano voice.

Two pianoforte recitals were given on January 21. Miss Mabel Rutland carried out a conventional programme with ability at Bechstein Hall, and at Æolian Hall Mr. York Bowen furthered his claims as an executant and composer of unusual proficiency.

HENKEL PIANOFORTE QUARTET.

This quartet, consisting of Madame Lily Henkel, Messrs. Fritz Hirt, Alfred Hobday, and Ivor James gave a very successful inaugural concert at Steinway Hall on January 21, and at once established a high plane of individual excellence and perfection of ensemble. The programme included Brahms's Pianoforte quartet in G minor, Op. 25, of which an admirable reading was given, Mozart's Quartet in G minor, and a Phantasie in F sharp minor, by Frank Bridge (first performance), which proved to be a work of singular beauty, especially as regards the Coda. A more strenuous climax in the middle section would have been welcome, and would also have thrown the qualities of the Coda into greater prominence. Mr. Campbell McInnes sang delightfully, and showed an exceptional command of mezza voce.

The playing of the London Trio, always of distinguished quality, attained an exceptionally high level at their concert at Æolian Hall on January 9. The concerted works performed were Beethoven's Trio in C minor (Op. 1, No. 3), and Tchaikovsky's Trio in A. Madame Amina Goodwin played pianoforte works by Handel and Kiriaff, and songs were contributed by Miss Margaret Balfour and Mr. Owen Colyer.

A Violoncello and Pianoforte sonata by M. Emanuel Moor was played for the first time in London at a concert given by the Classical Concert Society at Bechstein Hall on January 11. It was distinguished by the composer's usual scholarly manner and effective treatment. Señor Casals and Mr. Leonard Borwick gave the best possible interpretation of the violoncello and pianoforte parts respectively.

Mr. Joseph Holbrooke continued his series of modern chamber concerts at Steinway Hall on January 20 with a highly interesting programme. His own works were represented in favourable light by his Pianoforte quartet in G minor, No. 1. César Franck's Pianoforte quintet was heard for the second time in London within a week, and the scheme also included a characteristic Violin sonata by Max Reger, played by Mr. Albert Sammons and the concert-giver. The string players were the New Quartet, of which Mr. Sammons is leader. Songs were contributed by Miss Mary Groser.

Suburban Concerts.

Spohr's oratorio 'The last Judgment' was successfully sung by the choir of the Wesleyan Church, Sydenham, on December 11, with accompaniment on the organ, strings and timpani. The solos were sung by Miss Florence Jenner (soprano), Mrs. E. Jenner (contralto), Mr. Frank Wells (tenor), and Mr. Frank Partridge (bass). Mr. Edwin Jenner conducted. Dr. Frank N. Abernethy was the organist.

A performance of Cuthbert Nunn's church cantata, formed of scenes from 'Everyman,' was given on Wednesday, December 14, at St. George's, Perry Hill, under the direction of Mr. B. Vine Westbrook. Master Alfred Mellon presided at the organ. The soloists were Messrs. S. B. Turner (Everyman), H. R. Watson (Death), F. G. Smith (Messenger) and Master S. Hawkes (Good Deeds).

The Ealing Choral Society gave their first concert of the season on December 20 at the Victoria Hall. Highly creditable performances were given of Brahms's 'Song of Destiny,' Parry's 'Pied piper of Hamelin,' and Stanford's 'Songs of the Fleet.' In the last-mentioned work Mr. Frederick Ranałow gave excellent interpretations of the solo music. Both choir and orchestra did their work efficiently. Mr. Albert Thompson conducted.

A capital performance of the Christmas play, by Mr. H. J. Taylor (music) and Mr. H. R. Geddes (words), entitled 'Christmas in the Olden Time,' was given under the direction of Mr. Arthur T. Lash, organist and choirmaster of St. Matthias', Poplar, before a large audience, at the Town Hall, Poplar, on Thursday, January 5, by about seventy members of the church choir and dramatic society. The work has been given under the composer's direction many times during the last eight or nine years, at Dover.

The Buckhurst Hill Choral Society gave the first concert of the season on January 7. The chief feature was the performance of a work specially composed for the Society by its late president, Dr. Charles E. Adams, being a setting of Shelley's unfinished lines 'To music.' The occasion took the form of an 'In memoriam' concert for Dr. Adams. Other works performed were 'Brother, thou art gone before us' (Sullivan), 'Daybreak' (Fanning), and Mendelssohn's 42nd Psalm. The soloists were Miss Lucy France, Mr. Gwynne Davies and Mr. Ernest Yonge (viola). Mr. Otley Marshall conducted.

On January 11, the Emmanuel (Lambeth) Choral Society gave a performance of Sullivan's 'Festival Te Deum' at the Emmanuel Institute, under the conductorship of Mr. R. C. Law (organist and choirmaster of Emmanuel Church, Lambeth). The soloists were Miss F. Reynolds and Miss P. Law. The programme included: Sullivan's 'The long day closes,' Handel's 'The glory of the Lord,' Löhr's 'A slumber song,' Dudley Buck's 'In absence,' and Mendelssohn's chorals, 'To God on high,' 'Sleepers, wake! a voice is calling,' and 'To Thee, O God.' The choir sang throughout with much intelligence and good expression. The solo-vocalists were Miss Winifred Allan, Mr. H. Winterlood, and Mr. J. Manley Clark.

Mr. Matthew Kingston gave a concert-lecture on Tuesday evening, January 17, at the Walthamstow Public Hall, upon 'Frederic Chopin, the man and his music,' illustrated by the lecturer playing upon the pianoforte a typical selection of Chopin's works.

Music in the Provinces.

BIRMINGHAM.

Coming closely upon an exceptionally busy autumn season, the Christmas doings in matters musical in our large city are generally characterized by a period of dulness, King Pantomime at our theatres practically absorbing all interest. There was no exception to this rule during the past Yuletide, and there are really only a few matters to record.

Mention should be made of two orchestral concerts given in December last, which were not noted last month. The first, given by the Birmingham Symphony Orchestra, at the Town Hall, on December 10, was conducted by Mr. S. Coleridge-Taylor. By general request the sparkling and brilliant 'Nero' suite was included in the programme, its virile rendering creating the utmost enthusiasm. The novelty was the conductor's rhapsodic dance 'The Bamboula,' a fanciful composition strongly marked in rhythm and melodic to a degree. The vocal numbers were ably supplied by our local soprano, Miss Lillie Aston, and by Mr. James Coleman, a well-known basso attached to Lichfield Cathedral. The second orchestral concert took place in the Town Hall on December 14, given by the Birmingham Philharmonic Society, under Mr. (now Sir) Henry J. Wood's conductorship. The chief work performed was Mozart's 'Haffner' symphony. The soloist was Miss Johanne Stockmarr, who in Mozart's Concerto in A and in César Franck's Variations Symphoniques proved herself to be a scholarly and cultured performer. The novelty of the concert was Debussy's 'Fêtes,' from the cycle 'Nocturnes.' A welcome item was the conductor's orchestral arrangement for strings and oboe of some of Bach's organ works.

The Victorian Male-Voice Choir's eleventh annual concert took place in the Town Hall on December 17, conducted by Mr. W. E. Robinson. The selection of the unaccompanied choral music might certainly have been improved by the introduction of new and more polyphonic part-songs, madrigals and choruses, instead of always restricting their efforts to the same old, worn 'The Spartan heroes,' 'Comrades in arms,' 'The Britons,' and 'Soldiers' chorus' from 'Faust.' Indeed the only acceptable novelty was Granville Bantock's 'War song,' conducted by the composer. The choir is well balanced, and has made progress in the way of phrasing and gradation of light and shade. Madame de Vere Sapio and Mr. James Coleman were the solo vocalists.

The Birmingham Choral and Orchestral Association held its 255th concert at the Central Hall on December 17, the whole programme being devoted to a concert recital of Balfe's opera, 'The Bohemian girl,' conducted by Mr. Joseph H. Adams. The principal parts were allotted to Miss Edith Locker, Madame Marguerite Gell, Mr. Alfred Wootton, and Mr. William Burt.

The customary annual performance of the 'Messiah' by the Birmingham Festival Choral Society took place on Boxing night, the Town Hall again being completely filled by an audience principally composed of people residing in the outskirts of Birmingham and the Midlands, true worshippers of Handel. The choir sang gloriously, as it always does on these occasions, and no fault could be found with the orchestra and principals, the latter comprising Miss Mabel Manson, Miss Alice Lakin, Mr. John Harrison and Mr. Hamilton Harris. Dr. Sinclair conducted with his customary care and judgment, and Mr. C. W. Perkins rendered excellent help at the organ.

It fell once more to the Birmingham Amateur Opera Society to supply the musical entertainment in connection with the annual conversazione of the Midland Institute, held in the Town Hall and in the rooms of the Institute on January 10, 11, 12 and 13. Having practically exhausted the whole repertory of the Gilbert and Sullivan comic operas, they chose this time 'Utopia Limited,' originally produced at the Savoy in 1893. The whole performance proved to be one of the best things ever attempted by this old Society since its foundation. Mr. Franklyn Mountford conducted, and the orchestra was entirely professional.

BOURNEMOUTH.

The fifteenth Symphony concert of the present season, which took place on January 12, attracted a large audience to the Winter Gardens. The proceedings call for special mention by reason of the fact that a new work by Dr. Charles Maclean was performed under the direction of the composer. This was an orchestral suite, entitled 'Bayerische Fanni,' which is intended to reflect the character of the Bavarian Highlands, the composition having been penned in that romantic spot in September last. It consists of five movements, each of which has an explanatory title. The music reveals an originality of thought differing in a remarkable degree from the tendencies of the most extreme modernists. The quaintly-conceived work was played with much ability under the composer's direction.

BRISTOL.

The annual concert was given at Bristol Grammar School, Tyndall's Park, on December 21, and there was a large attendance. The orchestra was composed chiefly of local players, led by Mr. F. S. Gardner. Mr. C. W. Stear, director of music in the School, conducted with judgment. Dr. Cowen's 'John Gilpin,' which formed the chief attraction, was excellently performed. Both choir and band entered into the spirit of the composition, which reflects in a delightful manner the quaint humour of Cowper's stanzas. The audience were diverted and interested.

On January 12, the seventy-fifth ladies' night of the Bristol Madrigal Society attracted a great number of persons to the Victoria Rooms. The choir numbered 106 voices, who, under the direction of Mr. D. W. Rootham, presented admirably a well-arranged programme. The new president of the Society (Mr. P. Napier Miles, of Kingsweston) was heartily applauded as he took his seat. Besides being a warm supporter of local musical movements, he has given proof that he is a cultured amateur musician, and one of his pieces was included in the scheme. It is a part-song, 'Rose-cheek'd Laura, come,' a setting of lines by Thomas Campion. With several celebrated madrigals by the old masters there were included productions by modern musicians—Pearsall, who was one of the early members of the Society, being represented by 'Why with toil?' 'Sir Patrick Spens,' and his arrangement of 'Sumer is y cumen in.' These were admirably interpreted, and the second, as usual, repeated. Other contributions from modern writers were Mendelssohn's 'Hunting song' and 'The victor's return,' Walter Macfarren's 'The curlew,' Henry Leslie's 'Thine eyes so bright' (which carried off the prize offered by the Bristol Society in 1865), and Stanford's 'Diaphenia.'

The Bristol Musical Society, on January 21, gave a concert at Victoria Rooms, and there was a large attendance. Choir and band numbered 300, the leader of the orchestra being Mr. F. S. Gardner, and Mr. Hubert Hunt at the organ. The principal work presented was Gade's 'Crusaders,' admirably interpreted, with Miss May Peters, Mr. Frank Mullings and Mr. Jackson Potter as soloists. Mendelssohn's 'Ruy Blas' overture was played with spirit, and Hubert Bath's clever setting of the Ingoldsby Legend 'Look at the clock' brought an interesting concert to a termination. Mr. C. W. Stear, as usual, conducted with judgment.

DEVON AND CORNWALL.

THE THREE TOWNS.

Two important performances of the 'Messiah' were given by the Plymouth Guildhall Choir, with orchestra, on January 7, when a special feature was made of retaining the original pitch of the work. Apart from the sentiment attaching to such an idea, it could hardly otherwise be recommended, the general result being loss of brilliancy and vitality of colouring; and in some cases the principals were manifestly incommode. Many unfamiliar choruses were selected, and the chorus-singing generally was very fine. Mr. Alfred Serle led the band, and the principals were Miss Laura Evans-Williams, Miss Effie Martyn, and Messrs. Henry Turnpenney and Herbert Tracey.

DEVON.

The performance given by the Exeter Orchestral Society, on December 21, showed a marked advance in execution and musical discernment. As a variation on usual custom, strings only were employed, nor did the programme lack any of its interest. The playing of Liszt's Angelus, 'Prière aux Anges Gardiens,' and two of Coleridge-Taylor's Novellettes (Nos. 2 and 7) was probably the best string work the Society has yet done. The novelty consisted in Mr. Ernest Austin's clever and amusing variations on 'The Vicar of Bray,' for which the audience expressed hearty appreciation.

A new organ was opened, on January 4, at St. Andrew's Presbyterian Church, Torquay, Mr. J. B. Lawson, of Ardrossan, N.B., giving a recital.

CORNWALL.

Perranporth and District Choral Society sang 'The Ancient Mariner,' on January 3, with credit to themselves and their conductor, the Rev. R. T. C. Tolson, the tone being robust and good in intonation. The principals were the Misses Edith Blight and Beatrice Clemens, Messrs. R. K. Worth and Walter J. Belgrove. On the same date the Marazion Choral Class performed 'The May Queen,' conducted by Mr. Alan H. Thorne, the chorus being finely sung. Miss Isabel Miners, Miss C. Carbis, and Messrs. H. V. White, W. A. Phillips and Mrs. T. J. Jelbart sang the solos. Deverland Band and Choir (male-voices) have recently entered into partnership under Mr. T. Pascoe, and gave their first concert on January 16, with choruses, part-songs and band pieces. On January 17 the Truro People's Palace Male-Voice Choir gave a concert, conducted by Mr. A. G. Tanner; and Merriford Choral Society gave a miscellaneous programme of glees, &c., on January 18, Mr. Arthur Greet conducting. In aid of Kenwyn Nursing Fund a concert was given at the palace of the Bishop of Truro. Lis Escop (where there is a music room, ideal in acoustic properties) on January 11, in which Mr. Tertius Noble, organist of York Minster, took part as pianist. Lady Mary Trefusis, Mr. Perman and Canon Corfe were among the other contributors. Mr. Noble gave two organ recitals in the Cathedral on January 13.

The Choral Class and the Young Men's Club at Falmouth joined forces in a successful performance, on January 5, in character, of Vincent's 'The Spanish Gipsies.' Miss Edith Blight conducted at the pianoforte.

DUBLIN.

On December 19, the Dublin Orchestral Society gave its fifth and last concert for 1910, in the Gaicity Theatre. The programme included Dvorák's 'New World' symphony, Singaglia's 'Danse Piemontese,' and Wagner excerpts. Dr. Esposito conducted.

On December 21, Mr. Vincent O'Brien conducted a performance of 'The Messiah' in the Gaicity Theatre. The soloists were Miss Margaret Burke-Sheridan, Madame Joan Holland, Mr. Dan Jones and Mr. Arthur Winnock.

On January 11, the Orpheus Choral Society (conductor, Mr. Charles Kelly) gave a concert at the Antient Concert Rooms. The choir sang some well-seasoned part-songs, including Hecht's 'Charge of the Light Brigade'; and the soloists included Miss José Florac (soprano), Mr. Charles Kelly (who sang 'Ho! jolly Jenkin,' with male chorus), and Mrs. Eleanor Miley (pianist). Mr. George Hewson was the accompanist.

At the Royal Dublin Society, the Monday chamber music recitals re-commenced after the holidays on January 9, with a pianoforte recital by Dr. Esposito, who played Beethoven (Op. 111), and a number of Debussy's recently published Preludes.

On January 16, Miss Nora Thomson's String Quartet made their first appearance at these concerts, playing Haydn (Op. 33), Mendelssohn (Op. 44), No. 1, and Beethoven (Op. 59). The members of the Quartet are Miss Nora Thomson, Miss Madeleine Moore, Mons. Octave Grisard and Mr. Clyde Twelvrees.

The Sunday Orchestral Concerts re-commenced on January 15. Dr. Esposito conducted a good performance of Beethoven's seventh Symphony, and three 'Irish Dances' arranged by himself for orchestra from old Irish airs. Miss Queenie Eaton was the solo vocalist, and Mr. Clyde Twelvrees the solo violoncellist.

The Carl Rosa Company has just concluded a very successful four weeks' engagement at the Theatre Royal. The chief novelty was Goldmark's 'Queen of Sheba,' which proved a great attraction. Mr. Joseph O'Mara and Mr. William Dever, both specially engaged for the Dublin visit, were amongst the most popular of the soloists. The orchestra was exceptionally large and good.

EDINBURGH.

Mr. Ernest Schelling made his first appearance at Messrs. Paterson's orchestral concerts in the McEwan Hall on December 19 (the sixth of the series), and gave a splendid performance of the solo part in Liszt's 'Rhapsodie Espagnole,' arranged for pianoforte and orchestra by Busoni. He was also eminently successful in his playing of a group of Chopin pieces. The most important orchestral work performed was Beethoven's Symphony No. 7, in A.

Mr. Fritz Kreisler was the soloist at the seventh concert on December 26. He played Mozart's Violin concerto in D major, and later, accompanied by Mr. Scott Jupp, delighted the listeners with some pieces by old masters. The principal orchestral numbers were Schumann's Symphony No. 1, in B flat, and Maurice Ravel's 'Spanish rhapsody.'

At the eighth concert, on January 9, Señor Pablo Casals roused the audience to enthusiasm by his interpretation of the solo part in Dvorák's beautiful Concerto in B minor for violoncello and orchestra. The programme included Bruckner's long and somewhat diffuse 'Romantic' symphony.

Mr. Moonie's Choir gave its annual performance of the 'Messiah' in the McEwan Hall on Christmas Eve. A welcome innovation was the singing of the 'Adeste Fideles' before the commencement of the oratorio. In the oratorio the soloists were Madame Sobrino, Miss Mary Latta, Mr. W. H. Oldham, and Mr. Charles Tree. The accompaniments were provided by Miss Mary Russell and Mr. W. B. Moonie at the pianofortes, and Mr. Arthur J. Curle at the organ.

The Choral Union (conductor, Mr. T. H. Collinson) gave its forty-eighth annual performance of the 'Messiah' in the Music Hall on January 2. The soloists were Miss Perceval Allen, Miss Gertrude Lonsdale, Mr. William Boland and Mr. Herbert Brown. Mr. Gavin Godfrey presided at the organ and Mr. Henry Dambmann led the orchestra. During the Christmas season performances of the 'Messiah,' or selections from the work, were given in many of the churches in the city.

A successful concert in aid of the Mars Training Ship Institution was given in the Music Hall on January 14, by Mrs. Alexander Maitland's Choir and String Orchestra. The choir, which gave evidence of careful training, was heard in selections from Purcell's opera 'Dido and Aeneas,' and in the Finale to the first act of Mendelssohn's 'The Loreley.' Miss Violet Salvin was the soloist in the concerted works, and also sang a number of songs acceptably. Miss Kathleen Chabot contributed several pianoforte solos in excellent style, and Miss E. Buchanan and Miss Shephard-Walwyn gave a finished performance of Bach's Concerto in D minor for two violins and orchestra. The accompanist was Miss Bridget Maconochie.

In the Foresters' Hall, North Berwick, the local Orchestral Society (conductor, Mr. James Brodie), gave a concert on December 23 before a large audience. The programme comprised works by Mendelssohn, Schumann, Myddleton, and Volti. Songs were contributed by Miss Nina Horsburgh and Mr. George Campbell, violin solos by Mr. W. Watt Jupp, and violoncello solos by Mr. T. A. Townson. Mr. C. W. S. Jupp accompanied.

Musselburgh Choral Union (conductor, Mr. Robert Kay) gave a well-attended Scottish concert in the Town Hall on December 27. The concerted numbers consisted mainly of part-songs, which were admirably sung. The soloists were Miss Marie Thomson (soprano), Miss Eleanor Gardner (contralto), Mr. W. H. Oldham (tenor), Mr. Thomas Clow (baritone), and Mr. R. A. Buchan (violinist). Mr. John Robertson accompanied.

Mr. Kirkhope's Choir concert is always an interesting event in the musical life of the city, and the standard of performance achieved at the concert given in the Music Hall, on January 18, fully maintained the reputation of the choir as being one of the finest choral organizations in Scotland. The programme on this occasion comprised Mendelssohn's 'Walpurgis Night' and Schumann's 'Pilgrimage of the Rose.' These two works afforded the choir ample opportunities in which to display the many features of excellence always associated with their performances, and, needless to say, no point was missed. The soloists were Miss Esta d'Argo, Miss May Currie, Mr. Richard Ripley and Mr. Thorpe Bates. An efficient orchestra, led by Mr. Siegl, provided the accompaniments.

Miss Cowan Cockburn, a young local vocalist, made a successful début at a concert which she gave in Morningside Hall on January 19.

GLASGOW.

The last two classical concerts in 1910 were notable, the former for the first appearance at these concerts of Mr. Ernest Schelling as solo pianist, and the latter for Herr Fritz Kreisler's brilliant playing as solo violinist. Herr Kreisler brought to a first hearing here Mozart's fourth Violin concerto in D major, and the programme also included Brahms's third Symphony in F, as well as novelties by Maurice Ravel and Max Schillings. The New Year opened with three very fine choral performances, the first being 'The Messiah,' on January 2, when the Choral Union, under Dr. Coward, seemed to give new life and interest to Handel's familiar strains. (No less successful was a second performance before a 'popular' audience on January 12.) The second was 'The Creation,' by the Young Men's Christian Association Choral Institute, conducted by Mr. R. L. Reid. The valuable educational work done by Mr. Reid has more than once been commended in these columns, and his choir's rendering of 'The Creation' on January 4 was marked by great vigour, good tone, and a total absence of hesitancy. The soloists were Miss Rana Taggart and Messrs. Henry Brearley and Charles Tree, and the accompaniments were played by Mr. Coles's Orchestra, with Mr. J. E. Hodgson as organist. The third choral event was Elgar's 'King Olaf,' by the Pollokshields' Philharmonic Society, under the able direction of Mr. John Cullen. On this occasion the Society's performance reached its highest level, in fact no better choral singing has been heard in Glasgow for a long time. Conspicuously was this evidenced in the chorus 'I am the god Thor' and in the epilogue. The solo music was splendidly sung by Miss Edith Evans and Messrs. John Harrison and Lewys James, and the Scottish Orchestra gave Mr. Cullen their best aid in the accompaniments. Elgar's music has appealed so strongly to the Society that they have selected 'Caractacus' for performance at their next concert.

Mr. Henri Verbruggen was soloist at the ninth classical concert on January 3, giving a capital rendering of Spohr's eighth Violin concerto in A. The Symphony was Schubert's 'Unfinished,' and it was beautifully played by the Scottish Orchestra. The outstanding feature of the tenth concert, on January 10, was the remarkable playing by Señor Pablo Casals in Dvůřák's Concerto for violoncello and orchestra. Interest was shown also in the first performance here of Bruckner's fourth Symphony in E flat, the first movement of which was received with greatest favour. Possibly Handel's Concerto Grosso in D minor, which was also a novelty, gave much greater real pleasure to the audience.

For the eleventh Classical Concert, on January 17, the prospectus announced the first performance in Glasgow of a new Symphony in F major, by Mr. Młynarski, but, for some reason, Beethoven's fifth Symphony was substituted. Any feeling of disappointment at the change was more than compensated for by the excellence of Mr. Młynarski's interpretation of the C minor. Another keenly-appreciated number on the programme was Mr. Hamish MacCunn's clever overture 'Land of the mountain and the flood.' As solo pianist, Miss Katharine Goodson gave a powerful interpretation of Grieg's Pianoforte concerto in A minor. The Saturday Popular Orchestral Concerts continue to be well supported. The programmes have included Beethoven's 'Pastoral' Symphony, Schubert's Symphony in C, and Schumann's first Symphony in B flat, as well as a very fair share of 'novelties.'

LIVERPOOL AND DISTRICT.

The usual time-honoured performance of Handel's 'Messiah' was given by the Philharmonic Society on December 20. There is probably no work in which the choral forces of the Society appear to greater advantage, and their singing on this occasion was marked by an abundant, well-balanced tone, and alert attention to Dr. Cowen's masterful direction, which compassed all legitimate effects without recourse to startling innovations. The vocal principals were Madame Agnes Nicholls, Miss Phyllis Lett, Mr. John Harrison, and Mr. Hamilton Earle. The orchestral accompaniments were a specially delightful feature.

Another 'Messiah' performance worthy of record was that given by the Methodist Choral Union on December 26. Under the capable direction of Mr. P. H. Ingram, careful attention was paid to the choral features, and there was much to commend in the intelligent and responsive singing. The soloists were Miss Winifred Thomas, Miss Olive Hill, Mr. Tom Edwards, and Mr. James Coleman; the orchestra was led by Mr. John Lawson, with Mr. Coller as organist.

The first performance of Elgar's Violin concerto in the North of England was given in the presence of a crowded and deeply attentive audience in the Philharmonic Hall, on December 31, with Herr Kreisler as soloist and the distinguished composer as conductor. The artistic importance of the event was fully appreciated by all who had the good fortune to be present. Under such favourable conditions the first hearing of this work of genius created an entirely favourable impression. The accompaniments were very finely played by an orchestra limited in strings, but composed of artists selected from the Hallé Orchestra. There were other items in the programme: Bennett's 'Naiades' overture (a welcome revival), Mendelssohn's E minor Violin concerto, and Saint-Saëns's Introduction and Rondo Capriccioso—further vehicles for the display of Kreisler's prodigious virtuosity.

The passing of the Liverpool College of Music is noted with regret. Founded in 1891 as a non-dividend-paying company, its affiliation with the University of Liverpool was mooted, but the project fell through. Subsequently municipal control was advocated, having regard to the eighteen free Corporation studentships tenable at the College, but though the principle was conceded as regards these scholarships, further aid was not forthcoming, and recently an attempt to secure public support by subscriptions failed. It was found that the income from fees was insufficient to meet the expenses, and the yearly deficiency had to be met by the non-payment of fees payable as teachers to the trio of managing directors, Messrs. Carl Heinicke, H. Ernest Hunt and Alfred Ross. At a recent shareholders' meeting called to consider the financial position, voluntary liquidation was decided upon.

At the seventh concert of the Philharmonic Society, on January 10, the vocalist was the Danish tenor, M. Paul Schmides, and Madame Renée Chemet made a welcome and successful reappearance at these concerts as solo violinist. Her graceful, expressive, unerring playing invested the clear-cut features of the Bach A minor Concerto with a romantic if feminine charm. The pianoforte accompaniments to the German Lieder sung by M. Schmides were admirably played by Dr. Cowen. Two of the orchestral items bearing the same title had nothing else in common. They were Mozart's opera overture 'Don Giovanni' and Strauss's tone-poem 'Don Juan.' Of the latter the interpretation was highly interesting, as was that given of Debussy's 'L'Après-midi d'un faune.' The choir, in singing Glinka's lively polonaise from 'Life for the Czar,' were materially aided by the orchestra.

The second concert of the Hallé Orchestra, conducted by Dr. Hans Richter, on January 14, was signalled by a magnificent performance of Strauss's 'Don Quixote' for the first time here. The exposition given of this stupendously clever work realised to the full its extraordinary combination and alternation of rare musical beauty with impish descriptive realism. The bulk of the programme had fortunately preceded this daring and compelling music, if music it be. It included the 'Leonora III.' overture, Liszt's poem 'Les Préludes,' and Dvůřák's 'Otello' overture, a characteristic work.

The Blundellsand Orchestral Society, conducted by Mr. Ernst Schiever, gave a successful concert on January 12, at which they played Elgar's Serenade in E minor, Grieg's 'Holberg' Suite, and the accompaniment to Bruch's G minor Violin concerto, most skilfully played as regards the solo by Mr. Vivian Burrows. Songs were contributed by Mr. Charles Child.

In connection with the meetings of the North of England Education conference, held in the Collegiate School, Shaw Street, a paper was read on January 7 by Dr. Arthur Somervell, H.M. Inspector of Music to the Board of Education, on the subject of 'Singing in Schools.' In the course of his interesting remarks, he referred to the enormous importance of rhythm as the basis of wholesome and beautiful living. Mr. Harry Evans followed with a paper on the same subject. He also advocated a more enlightened and sympathetic method of teaching music in schools. Verbatim reports of both papers appear in the current issue of The School Music Review. A demonstration of the Tomlins method of teaching was given by a choir from St. Patrick's School, conducted by Miss Travis, a teacher who has achieved notable local success in this direction.

The second performance of the new Elgar Violin Concerto occurred on January 21, with M. Zacharewitsch as soloist, and the orchestra of the Welsh Choral Union, led by Mr. Vasco Akeroyd, under the direction of Mr. Harry Evans. Mr. Evans had evidently made a deep study of the orchestral features of the music, and M. Zacharewitsch played with extraordinary technical mastery and deep feeling, consequently the Concerto sensibly increased the favourable impression made by its earlier hearing here. The performance really struck a deeper note. The player held his audience from the outset, and after the first movement, a torrent of applause broke out. The Finale was brilliantly played, and the accompanied Cadenza, which is such an original and novel feature of the Concerto, again created its profoundly moving effect. It was a performance which emphasised the lyrical and pathetic beauty of the music as well as its exaltation. M. Zacharewitsch is well qualified, temperamentally as well as technically, as an exponent of the work. Both he and Mr. Harry Evans at its conclusion were called upon to share the applause of a deeply moved audience. Previous to the Concerto, a delightful performance of Handel's 'Acis and Galatea' was given, through the choral features of which, especially 'Wretched lovers,' the splendid choir moved with buoyant steps. The soloists were Miss Edith Evans, Mr. Harold Wilde, and Mr. Robert Radford.

Distinction was given to the fifth of the Vasco Akeroyd Symphony Concerts on January 17, by the presence of Sir Charles V. Stanford, who contributed his 'Ode to Discord' and inspiring 'Songs of the Fleet,' sung by Mr. Plunket Greene and a specially organized choir. A crowded audience showed keen appreciation of Sir Charles's clever work, in which abundant skill is manifest, as well as wholesome fun.

Under the title of the Fairfield Glee and Madrigal Society, the disbanded Fairfield Choral Society has been happily revived and re-organized. The unaccompanied singing of this promising mixed choir of nearly eighty voices, at their concert on January 17, under the direction of Mr. Arthur Davies, was especially commendable in Stanford's 'Corydon, arise,' Hubert Parry's 'There rolls the deep,' Stewart's 'Cruisee Lawn,' and Fanning's 'The shepherd's waking.'

At their concert on January 19, the Brunswick Male-voice Choir, conducted by Mr. F. A. Knight, gave evidence of well directed con amore singing in Walford Davies's 'Hymn before action,' Mendelssohn's 'To the sons of art,' and Protheroe's 'Roman soldiers.' Interest was added by the baritone solos of Mr. Emlyn Davies.

MANCHESTER AND DISTRICT.

At the first meeting in the New Year of the Manchester Literary Club, public allusion was made by the chief of the City Libraries, Mr. C. W. Sutton, to the remarkable library of music and books on musical art which Dr. Watson had collected and presented to the Manchester Public Libraries' Committee, together with a number of rare musical instruments. Three of Dr. Watson's musical compositions were played and sung, one of them, 'An old Sicilian Pastoral,' being the last musical work composed by him.

The last Brodsky concert before the Christmas recess brought an unknown work, the A major Quartet by Borodine, brilliantly pictorial and unconventional, never striking very deep maybe, but none the less captivating to western ears. In the Brahms Pianoforte quartet in A major, Mr. Frederick Dawson joined Messrs. Brodsky, Speelman and Fuchs, the pianist proving no less accomplished in the more intimate form of chamber music than in the bigger concerted works. It is not given to every virtuoso pianist to excel in both branches.

The Quartet led by Miss Edith Robinson, gave a concert on November 23, notable for a fine performance of the rarely heard Clarinet quintet of Brahms (Op. 115), the wind part being played by Mr. H. Mortimer, a former student of the Royal College here.

Mr. Francis Harford does not sing too often here, although at the College, but his songs always reveal a fine eclecticism.

Miss Bertha Guthrie, Miss Leon (a pupil of Casals with a fine, spontaneous style), and Mr. Charles H. Kelly (pianist) gave a concert on November 28, Miss Guthrie contributing no fewer than eighteen Lieder.

After many weary years of waiting, the 'Christmas Oratorio' of Bach (or considerable portions of it) has been heard in Manchester under Dr. Richter, who first introduced us to the B minor Mass, the 'Wedding cantata,' and at least three of the alla cappella motets. It would be mere affectation to say that the portions of the 'Christmas Oratorio' performed on December 22 had been prepared with as much care as the B minor Mass some years since; there were spells of capable singing, generally where the idiom was Handelian rather than the real Bach; and practically without exception the chorales were finely and expressively sung, but the general choral result revealed the old Hallé difficulty of too much work to be prepared in the necessarily limited time for it to be done really well; there is only one end to this policy—fewer works, all of them great ones, and properly rehearsed. The soloists were Miss Phyllis Lett, Madame Agnes Nicholls, Messrs. William Green and Herbert Brown.

The first concert of the New Year was memorable for the superb reading by Richter of Elgar's 'In the South,' made additionally interesting to some in the audience by the contrast with the composer's more wayward interpretation at Liverpool a fortnight earlier, on the occasion when the Violin concerto was performed by Kreisler. All those monumental qualities in Richter's art find ample scope in this work, and never before did one realise so vividly the wonderfully appropriate character of that domineering, relentless 'steam-roller' (or 'Siebentöter,' as the Germans have it) theme in A flat minor. Zimbalist made his first Hallé appearance here the same evening, choosing Max Bruch's 'Scottish fantasia' for his principal work.

The programme of the Wagner concert on January 19, was mainly drawn from 'Die Meistersinger,' Dr. Richter having pieced together numerous extracts which gave poor, opera-starved Manchester some glimpses of the wondrous beauties of this sunny comedy.

The January Promenade Orchestral Concerts, under Mr. Simon Speelman, have introduced novelties in Mousorgsky's 'Song of the Flea,' Mr. Charles Tree being the singer, and some new French Holiday Sketches for orchestra by one of the Hallé violoncello players, Mr. J. H. Foulds.

In the programme of the first concert of the New Year in the Gentlemen's Series, conducted by Sir H. J. Wood in the Midland Hall, Bach, Liszt, Berlioz, Schubert, Saint-Saëns, Mousorgsky, Max Bruch and Wagner all rubbed shoulders. The audience at these concerts demands something for all tastes, and if the present conductor cannot gratify them, nobody can. The Manchester Orpheus Male-Voice Choir, trained by Mr. W. Sheridan Nesbitt, showed what extremely brilliant results may be obtained from the association of our finest smaller competitive choirs with an orchestra handled by one who will not let the players swamp the singers; very strange it is that such a superb choir should never before have been heard here with orchestral accompaniment. Max Bruch's 'Frithjof' may not be brilliant choral music, judged by latter-day standards, but this fine choir quite glorified it, particularly in the Scenes III. and IV. Miss Ellen Beck and Mr. Herbert Heyner took the solos in the choral work with great distinction.

Manchester is to have its first experience of the Elgar Violin concerto on March 6 from Sir Henry J. Wood and his Queen's Hall Orchestra, with Kreisler as soloist.

Among the concerts of the month may be noted the third visit since 1903, to the Schiller-Anstalt, of the Blackpool Glee and Madrigal Society, on January 7. Choral songs by Bach, Schumann, Brahms, Cornelius, Elgar ('Go, song of mine'), Delius and Debussy gave great delight to this cultured audience, particularly the two latter composers, and, had time permitted, both 'On Craig Dhu' and 'Cold Winter' might have been repeated—ultra-critical Manchester thus confirming the verdict of popular Manchester, as recorded here last month; clearly, therefore, in this part of the country, there is a future for what Mr. James Hunker might call these 'Anarchs of Art.'

NEWCASTLE AND DISTRICT.

The Newcastle and Gateshead Choral Union have already announced the outlines of their programme for next season. The first concert will include Dr. Cowen's 'The Veil,' and an orchestral work by the same composer, who is expected to conduct. Other works to be rehearsed by the choir are Parry's 'Blest pair of Sirens,' Dvorák's 'Spectre's bride,' and some madrigals.

For some time the Classical Concert Society has been alive to the pressing claims of the modern French school, and on Friday, January 20, gave another interesting programme dealing with that vital feature of the music of to-day. The concert was honoured with the presence of M. Ravel, who accompanied a large group of his songs, beautifully sung by Madame Willaume-Lamber. Three of the extraordinary songs from the 'Histoires naturelles' were included. The Parisian Quartet, surely one of the finest combinations of the day, played very beautifully the same composer's imaginative and plaintive Quartet, revelling in the many opportunities afforded of romantic colouring. The strings afterwards played Franck's soulful Pianoforte quintet in conjunction with M. M. Dumesnil.

YORKSHIRE.

The musical celebrations of Christmastide are usually confined to performances of 'Messiah,' but these are necessarily by way of anticipation, and more strictly 'seasonable' were two church performances of Brahms's German 'Requiem'—both on the same day, December 21—which were in recognition of the season of Advent. In York Cathedral the work was given by the choirs of the cathedral and Leeds Parish Church in conjunction, Dr. Bairstow, of Leeds, conducting, and Mr. Noble, of York, playing the organ, which was supplemented by drums and pianoforte, while the solos were taken by members of the York choir, Mr. Dawson, and a choir boy, Norman Hodgson. In Ripon Cathedral the work has been heard on several previous occasions, but on this one the instrumental forces were strengthened, the organ, played by Mr. W. E. Cave, being supplemented by a contingent of the Leeds Municipal Orchestra, and with a pianoforte, on which Mr. C. L. Naylor played the important harp part. Here, too, the soloists were of the cathedral, Mr. J. W. Senior and a treble, named Winn. In both cases the surroundings and conditions of the performances conducted to an appreciation of the serious, lofty mood of the music, and enhanced the impression which it made.

At Leeds the Choral Union gave, under Dr. Coward's direction, a brilliant and effective performance of 'Elijah' on January 11. Of particular interest was the appearance of Miss Jean Kirk, once a member of the choir, as the solo soprano, for this was her debut in that capacity since she has been in training at the Royal College of Music. Her voice is of exceptional beauty, a soprano of rich quality; she already uses it with considerable skill, and made an excellent impression. The other soloists were Miss Alys Dacre, Mr. Albert Watson and Mr. Thorpe Bates, the last-named an admirable 'Elijah,' who secured a strongly dramatic effect without loss of dignity or lack of refinement. The chorus-singing was throughout of a high order of excellence, powerful and flexible. On January 14 a considerable proportion of the Leeds municipal concert programme was devoted to Bach, from whose works the Concerto for two violins in D minor, the orchestral Suite in D, a 'Sinfonia,' and some vocal solos were chosen, while in the second part of the programme a liberal extract from the third Act of 'Lohengrin' was admirably sung by Miss Mary Swailes and Mr. H. Brearley. Mr. Fricker conducted, and the solo violinists were Miss Lily Simms and Miss Dorothy Broughton. The interest of these concerts is being enhanced by preliminary lectures, given by local musicians. That on Bach's music was entrusted to Dr. Bairstow.

On January 17 a chamber concert was given at Leeds, at which some rarely-heard music was heard, the programme including a Quartet by Kuhlau for four flutes, Suites for flute and pianoforte by Widor and Mongin, and a Suite for pianoforte and violin by Emile Bernard. Mr. Lupton Whitelock, who is first flute in the Municipal Orchestra, and Mr. Edward Elliott (violin) were assisted by Mrs. Elliott as pianist. The next evening, at one of the concerts of the 'Leeds Trio,' Brahms's early Pianoforte trio in B (Op. 8) was played by Messrs. Cohen, Schott and Herbert Johnson in its revised form, together with Schubert's charming Trio in B flat (Op. 99), and Debussy's individual and interesting String quartet in G minor, which has now been heard on several occasions at Leeds, always with increasing interest. At the Leeds musical evening on January 10, Miss Warwara Irmannoff and Mr. Waddington Cooke gave an enjoyable recital of violoncello and pianoforte music, including in their programme sonatas by Beethoven (Op. 69) and Rachmaninoff (Op. 19). A series of free lecture recitals was begun on January 9 by Mr. C. Wilkinson, a Leeds pianist, who had as his vocal colleague Mr. Gordon Heller.

On the same evening, by something of a coincidence, a series of free chamber concerts was begun at Bradford. Mr. S. Midgley, a well-known Bradford musician, has long been agitating in favour of 'music for the people,' and, after vainly endeavouring to get the Corporation to step in, has persuaded some of his fellow-townsmen to supply the funds for an experiment which is to extend over three seasons, by which time it is hoped at least to prove whether there is any demand for such music. At the first concert, Pianoforte trios by Beethoven (C minor, Op. 1), Schubert (Op. 99) and Schumann were played by Mr. Midgley (pianoforte), Mr. Dunford (violin) and Mr. Schott (violoncello), and songs by Delius, Schubert, Mendelssohn and von Flieitz were sung by Miss Nellie Judson. The Lord Mayor inaugurated the project with some introductory remarks, and the attention paid by the large audience was a welcome sign of their interest. The issue of the scheme will be awaited with great interest. On January 13, at the Bradford subscription concert, Dr. Richter and the Hallé Orchestra introduced to Yorkshire Strauss's 'Don Quixote,' which, though appreciation was hardly possible on a first hearing, seemed to make a distinct impression, to which the artistic playing of the solo violoncello part by Mr. Fuchs contributed. The band played admirably, and Dr. Richter's reading, if inclined to be too serious and heavy-handed in the purely fantastic portions, made the most of the nobler passages, and especially of the Don's praise of chivalry, which was very finely rendered. At the Bradford Arts Club, on January 17, an evening was devoted to the songs of Granville Bantock, interpreted by pupils of Mr. Biltcliffe, under his direction. The chief things in the Bradford Permanent Orchestra's concert, on January 21, were the Andante and Finale from Mendelssohn's 'Italian' Symphony, Sullivan's 'Di Ballo' overture, and Liszt's 'Hungarian' Fantasia for pianoforte and orchestra. Miss Leginska's beautiful touch and refined execution in the last-named work were most delightful. Mr. Wilfrid Hudson was the vocalist, and Mr. Allen Gill conducted.

BERLIN.

The decision of Professor Arthur Nikisch to continue his duties as Conductor of the Philharmonic Concerts, and not to go to Vienna, was acknowledged by the enthusiastic ovation with which he was greeted when he appeared at the fourth Philharmonic concert to conduct Bruckner's fifth Symphony in B flat.—At the fifth Symphony Concert of the Königliche Kapelle, Dr. Richard Strauss secured fine performances of his own tone-poem, 'Macbeth,' and of Berlioz's 'Symphonie fantastique.'—A new Pianoforte Concerto in D minor, by the Swedish composer Wilhelm Stenhammar, was produced at the fourth concert of Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde (conductor, Herr Oscar Fried). accompaniment scored for orchestra by Herr Stransky, were heard for the first time in Berlin. The former work was received with mixed feelings. A Schumann concert was given shortly before Christmas in the Philharmonic. A fine performance of the music to Byron's 'Manfred' was given, under the direction of Herr Felix Mottl. The part of Manfred was recited to perfection by Dr. Ludwig Willner.—The Russian composer Serge Liapounoff gave a concert of his own compositions, the programme of which included the Pianoforte sonata, Op. 27, and the interesting songs 'Das Bildnis,' 'Morgen' and 'Am Ufer des Ganges.' At a subsequent orchestral concert, M. Liapounoff conducted Balakirew's second Symphony, the Overture to 'King Lear,' and posthumous Pianoforte concerto (soloist, M. Leonid Kreutzer).—At his pianoforte recital, Herr Möckel introduced Cyril Scott's new Pianoforte sonata, Op. 66. On December 22, a new opera, 'Das vergessene Ich,' composed by Waldemar Wendland to the libretto by Richard Schott, was produced at the Komische Oper. Jean Nougues's effective opera 'Quo vadis' achieved considerable success on its recent first performance at the Municipal Theatre.—An interesting selection of Russian music was given at the fourth Philharmonic concert (conductor, Herr Ernst Wendel). Gade's very rarely heard cantata 'Comala' (after Ossian).

CARLSRUHE.

After long and elaborate preparations the Indian Mysterium 'Mahadewa,' written and composed by Felix Gotthelf, has been produced at the Court Theatre. The plot of the text-book follows the contents of Goethe's poem 'Der Gott und die Bajadere.' The music is said to be clever, but lacking in originality.

COLOGNE.

At the second Gützenich concert, Herr Fritz Steinbach secured an almost ideal performance of Max Bruch's choral work 'Odysseus.' Franz Neumann's opera 'Liebele!' (the libretto of which is adapted from Arthur Schnitzler's play) has been the most interesting novelty of the operatic season. Another interesting event was the first performance in Germany of Ferdinand Le Borne's opera 'Die Girondisten' (to the libretto of André Leneka and Paul de Choudens), which took place a short time ago.—At its last concert the Kölner Männergesangverein gave a fine interpretation of Zöllner's choral work 'Columbus.'

CRACOW.

The following works, new to Cracow, were performed at the last two concerts of the musical Society, viz., Brahms's Tragic Overture, 'Song of Destiny' and fourth Symphony in E minor, the 'Crucifixus' for eight-part chorus, by Lotti, Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem 'Die Toteninsel,' and Mahler's third Symphony in D minor for orchestra, female and boys' chorus, and alto solo.—The Munich Tonkünstlerorchester, conducted by M. Besides works by Liszt, César Franck and Chabrier, the Lithuanian Rhapsody by Mieczyslaw Karłowicz and Ludomir Rozycki's symphonic poem 'Anelli' were heard with much interest.

DÜSSELDORF.

At the municipal theatre, the first performance of the pantomime 'Der Schneemann,' by the youthful Viennese composer Erich Wolfgang Korngold, was given

NEW YORK.

Puccini's new opera, 'La Fanciulla del West,' was produced at the Metropolitan Opera House with sensational success. The libretto is an adaptation of the melodrama by Belasco (who supervised the stage production). There are wide divergences of opinion as to the value of the work, but it is generally admitted that the scoring and workmanship are masterly. It is said that the music often approaches the idiom of Debussy while retaining the composer's own melodiousness. Puccini has not imparted much local American colour to his score; the work is considered to be an 'Italian opera with an American plot.' The opera was performed to perfection under the musical direction of Signor Toscanini. The leading parts were impersonated imitatively by Signori Caruso and Amato, and Miss Destinn.—Another most interesting production which took place at the same institution, on December 28, was that of Humperdinck's new opera 'Die Königskinder.' The work is said to show Humperdinck at his best in every way. The leading parts were created by Miss Geraldine Farrar, and Messrs. Jadlowker and Goritz. Herr Alfred Hertz conducted.

PARIS.

On December 29, the first performance in Paris of Massenet's opera 'Don Quichotte' was given at the Théâtre Lyrique de la Gaîté. Mérané, was successfully produced at the Grand Opéra.—At the Colonne concert on December 18, the first part of Alberic Magnard's secular oratorio 'Guercœur' was heard with considerable interest.

STUTTGART.

Hans Pfitzner's interesting opera 'Der arme Heinrich' was recently given at the Court Theatre.

VIENNA.

The Mozartgemeinde deserves much credit for its efficient concert performance of Mozart's 'Idomeneo.' Weber's very rarely heard cantata, 'Der erste Ton,' was given under the auspices of the Urania Society, and aroused considerable interest. The well-known conductor, Herr Fritz Steinbach, made his first appearance in Vienna at a concert of orchestral works by Brahms, and found also here much favour.—At the Volkspoper a new comic opera, 'Kleider machen Leute,' composed by Alexander Zemlinsky, has recently been produced with considerable success. The libretto by Leo Feld has been cleverly adapted from Gottfried Keller's novel.—Contrary to custom, the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra has re-elected Herr Felix von Weingartner as its conductor for the next three years, a proceeding which is without precedent in the history of the Orchestra.—The opera 'Cleopatra,' by the Danish composer, August Enna, was recently given for the first time at the Stadttheater. The well-written and dramatically effective work obtained a genuine success. The performance of Sir Alexander Mackenzie's 'The Sun-god's return' is referred to in another column.

Our American contemporary, The Etude, devoted its issue of January to English music, of which it gave a comprehensive survey. English musicians should be gratified at the tribute. The following articles appeared: The influence of oratorio upon English music, by Frederic Corder; English composers of to-day, by Ernest Newman; The development of piano playing in England, by Katharine Goodson; Is technique strangling beauty? by S. Coleridge-Taylor; Famous music schools of England, by Dr. H. W. Wareing; English composers and church music, by Dr. A. Madeley Richardson; English musical examinations, by Dr. Orlando A. Mansfield; English organists past and present, by Edwin Lemare.

The Guildhall School of Music, acting on the proposals of Mr. Landon Ronald, the recently-appointed principal, announces a new scheme for students desirous of adopting music as a profession. Hitherto the School has made its widest appeal to amateurs, but yet it has contrived as a bye-product to turn out many highly competent professionals. The committee has now formulated a definite plan for the education of students who are willing to place themselves at the School upon the same terms and conditions as are universally thought desirable in order to secure professional training. Full particulars can be obtained from the secretary, Mr. H. Saxe Wyndham.

In the article on Grove's 'Dictionary of Music' in our January issue, it is stated that only S. S. Wesley composed an anthem: to the words 'All go to one place.' The dictionary, however, is correct in stating that S. Wesley also set these words. The anthem was composed in memoriam Charles Wesley. It is now out of print. In our remarks on the article on 'Touch,' it should have been mentioned that Mr. Franklin Taylor contributed the section dealing with the pianoforte, and Sir Walter Parratt that dealing with the organ. Mr. Ernest Austin should be added to the list of British musicians noticed in the Appendix.

Dr. Frederic Cowen's new choral work 'The Veil,' which was so successfully produced at the recent Cardiff festival, will be performed for the first time in London at the Queen's Hall on February 21, with the Cardiff Festival Choir and the full London Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of the composer. The solos will be sung by Miss Agnes Nicholls, Miss Phyllis Lett, Mr. Walter Hyde, and Mr. Herbert Brown. Other performances are being arranged at Liverpool, Sheffield, Newcastle and Leicester. The general opinion of those who heard the cantata at Cardiff is that it is Dr. Cowen's finest work.

We are informed that in connection with the Festival of Empire and Imperial Exhibition, to be held in London from May to October, great county choirs are being organized for concerts on the Handel Orchestra of the Crystal Palace. It is anticipated that many counties will send representative choirs; several choirs are already in active organization. Choral contests are also included in the scheme. The organizer and musical director is Mr. Granville Humphreys. All inquiries should be addressed to the Entertainments Department, Empire House, 175, 176, Piccadilly, W.

'Some thoughts on Polyphonic Rhythm' was the subject of a paper read before a meeting of the Musical Association at Messrs. Broadwood's Rooms, on January 17, by Mr. Charles Kennedy Scott. He connected prose language and the older irregular musical rhythms with contemplative, abstract emotion; metrical language and music with active, physical emotion, and argued with close and attractive reasoning that in the former language music was more suited to the expression of religious feeling than the latter.

By permission of the Dean, a performance of J. S. Bach's Passion music according to St. Matthew, with full orchestral accompaniment, will be given at Westminster Abbey by the Bach Choir, under the conductorship of Dr. H. P. Allen, on Friday evening, February 17, at 7.30. The soloists will be Miss Rhoda von Glehn, Miss Dilys Jones, Mr. Gervase Elwes, and Mr. J. Campbell McInnes. The report of the Leeds Musical Festival Executive Committee reveals a loss of £162. It says, 'Although there has been this small loss on the festival, there is no doubt whatever that the changes made in the personnel of the chorus by the wider area from which it was selected greatly raised the standard of the performances, and secured for the festival of 1910, perhaps the finest chorus ever heard in Leeds.'

The programme chosen for the 1911 Festival of the Nonconformist Choir Union, to be held at the Crystal Palace under the conductorship of Mr. Frank Idle, includes Handel's 'But as for His people,' Gounod's 'By Babylon's wave,' and Mr. Idle's 'Now is my Chloris fresh as May.'

The band and chorus, which numbered about fifty performers, including the principals, were all amateurs. The audience were appreciative, and specially warm in their applause of the second Act, the whole setting of the storm scene, the difficult and dramatic music of the Erl-king's daughter (Miss W. Mr. Wiblin proved a careful conductor, and Mr. Kerry an excellent organist.

PENRITH.—The Musical Society held their second two days' festival on December 7 and 8. On the first night the band and choir numbered 230 performers, the former consisting chiefly of members of the Richter and Liverpool Symphony Orchestras, led by Mons. André Mangeot. Several local amateurs also assisted. The programme included Dvorák's 'Te Deum,' in which the soloists were Miss Alice Westmorland (Penrith) and Mr. Herbert Brown; Stanford's 'Revenge'; Elgar's 'Spanish serenade,' for chorus and orchestra; and a choral ballad, 'The Abbot's blessing,' written for this festival by the Rev. T. W. Stephenson, who himself conducted. The choir, under their able conductor, Mr. E. Godfrey Brown, sang with admirable restraint and intelligence, their interpretation of the more delicate passages in both the works being especially praiseworthy. On the second night 'The Messiah' was given. For this work the choir was strengthened by singers from Appleby, Kirby Stephen and Brough. Band and choir together numbered 350 performers. The soloists were Miss Evans-Williams, Miss Dily Jones, Mr. Webster Millar and Mr. Herbert Brown. For a small town, the performances on both nights were noteworthy. We are glad to add that the efforts of the committee were splendidly supported by crowded and appreciative audiences, the receipts amounting to upwards of £220, an amount which will provide a small balance after payment of the heavy expenses.

PETERHEAD.—The fifth annual performance of 'Israel in Egypt,' by the Peterhead Choral Society, which took place on January 2, showed no break in the musical progress of this body, and surpassed all previous efforts. The orchestra consisted chiefly of members of the Queen's Cross Amateur Orchestral Society. Mr. Frederick Boothroyd was at the organ. A large audience showed full appreciation of the merits of the performance, and of the work of Mr. Warren T. Clemens as conductor.

REDDISH.—A creditable performance of Spohr's 'Last Judgment' was given at St. Elisabeth's Church on December 20. The organist was Mr. Owen G. Ferry, and the soloists were Miss Florence Skinner, Miss Eleanor Livesey, Mr. William Stark and Mr. John Astington.

RUNCORN.—On three evenings in Christmas week, performances of 'Midsummer night's Dream' (two acts) were given by the County Secondary School, whose stock of amateur talent is much to be envied. The music, adapted from Mendelssohn, was given under the direction of the headmaster, Mr. Luther Gledhill.

ST. HELENS.—The most successful concert ever given in St. Helens was that of the Musical Society on November 23. A large measure of this success was due to the visit to his native town of Mr. Thomas Beecham, who conducted the excellent professional orchestra (led by Mr. Vasco V. Akeroyd) in the 'Meistersinger' overture, Prelude to Act III. of 'Lohengrin,' 'Peer Gynt' suite, and other works. The Society were heard to great advantage under their own conductor, Dr. S. B. Siddall, in 'Hiawatha's Wedding-feast'; also in Von Holst's eight-part 'Ave Maria' for female voices, Macdowell's 'Dance of the gnomes' (male voices), and Elgar's 'Go, song of mine.' Mr. Webster Millar was the vocalist of the occasion.

SHERBORNE.—The School Musical Society gave their 194th concert on December 19. The programme included Act II. of Gluck's 'Orpheus.' The choruses were efficiently sung in Italian by the choir of ninety boys, Mr. Ivor Dennis, a master of the School, ably sustaining the solo part. The orchestra, augmented for the occasion, was led by Mr. C. Regan. Mr. C. H. Hodgson conducted.

TREORCHY.—The first performance in South Wales of Bach's 'St. Matthew' Passion was given by the Choral Society on December 26. Great credit is due to Mr. J. T. Jones, who conducted, for introducing this work and preparing so excellent a performance. The tenor soloist was Mr. Frank Mullings, who fulfilled his exacting task with great ability. The performance was repeated on December 27, when also an evening concert was given at which Mendelssohn's 'Hymn of Praise' was sung.

TROON, N.B.—The Troon Parish Church Choral Society gave a highly successful performance of 'The Messiah' in the church on December 28, under the conductorship of Mr. A. Dinsdale. The accompaniments were provided by a contingent of strings from the Scottish Orchestra.

TUNBRIDGE WELLS.—On Christmas Day the Mount Pleasant Congregational Church Choir performed Part I. of Handel's 'Messiah,' together with the 'Hallelujah Chorus.' The solos and recitatives were divided amongst various members of the choir, who acquitted themselves very creditably. Mr. Sidney Coote, the organist and choirmaster of the church, directed the service, and presided at the organ throughout.

WEMBLEY.—The Choral Society gave the first concert of their twenty-first season on December 16. The first part consisted of an admirable performance of Handel's 'Acis and Galatea.' The solo parts were sustained by Mlle. Ernestine Enriquez, Mr. William Doe, Mr. Alfred C. Steed, and Mr. William Burt, and the work was accompanied by an efficient orchestra of strings, with pianoforte.

WELLINGTON (N.Z.).—On November 11, Elgar's 'The Dream of Gerontius' was performed for the first time in New Zealand. The executants were the Wellington Choral Society, conducted by Mr. J. Maughan Barnett. The dimensions of the choir, which consisted of 160 singers, were small, but not too small for adequate interpretation of the choral music, and the qualities of expressiveness and good tone, which are independent of numbers, were present in the singing. Thus Elgar's fully-developed style was given its first introduction to a New Zealand audience in a manner to secure full appreciation. The soloists were Miss Nellie Castle, Mr. E. J. Hill and Mr. John Prouse. The municipal orchestra played the instrumental part efficiently. The performance was highly creditable to all concerned.—A combined orchestral concert and organ recital was given at the Town Hall on November 23 by the Municipal Orchestra, and Mr. Barnett. The chief of the orchestral numbers conducted by Mr. Barnett was the Adagio from Beethoven's second Symphony; his principal organ solo was Bach's Prelude and Fugue in C minor.

WOKING.—The Musical Society gave their first concert of the season on January 17. MacCunn's 'The wreck of the Hesperus,' which was performed for the second time by the Society, on this occasion showed off the qualities of the small choir to great advantage. Other choral works in the programme were Mr. Coleridge-Taylor's 'Kubla Khan' and Brahms's 'Rhapsody.' In both works the solo portions were taken by Miss Helen Blain. Mr. Patrick White conducted.

WOOLWICH.—The forty-second concert of the Borough of Woolwich Orchestral Society was given on December 14, at the Town Hall. The programme included Rimsky-Korsakoff's Symphonietta in A minor, the 'Fidelio' and 'Fra Diavolo' overtures, Gounod's 'Saltarello,' Mr. Edward German's harvest dance ('The Seasons'), and Grieg's Norwegian Dances, Nos. 3 and 4. The vocalists were Miss Ida Kahn and Mr. Herbert Heyner. Mr. Sidney Horton conducted.

YEovil.—On January to the Choral Society gave their winter miscellaneous concert, consisting of part-songs and orchestral items. Solos were rendered by Miss Christine Bywater (soprano) and the Rev. E. Capel-Cure (violincello). Mr. H. C. L. Stocks was the conductor.

Answers to Correspondents.

J. P. H.—Mr. Jameson's English version runs as follows:

Spring-time's behest,
within his breast,
on heart and voice there was laid:
then sang he as Nature bade;
and to his need the power was granted from her dower.

It is, of course, a very free translation from 'The Meistersinger.'

VOCALIST.—The upper register of a baritone is often difficult to develop. It is sometimes discoverable by humming high pitches or by singing softly with a minimum of restraint. Sonority will then come by practice. The tenor voice must be similarly treated; but opinions differ. See the article in our present number.

STRAD.—There are tens of thousands of violins labelled 'Stradivarius,' that is, made on that model. You can buy a new one so labelled for less than ten shillings, or you can buy labels and fix them yourself. But all the same, your violin may be worth £1,000.

SYBIL EATON.—The motto in the score of Elgar's Concerto means 'Here lies buried the soul of —,' Beethoven's Symphonies arranged for pianoforte are published in Peters' edition in two volumes, price 2s. 9d. each.

BROWN.—We are unable to help to unravel the notation of the Antiphon you send. We cannot print the copy. The author may attach untold value to the copyright.

Numerous other answers are held over or have been dealt with privately.

ITS VALUE TO THE TEACHER.

In "The Musical Educator" every section is dealt with by an expert. Its value to the teacher of music is obvious, because it shows the way—at once simple and lucid—in which some of the greatest of musical professors would set about the instruction of a pupil anxious to perfect himself in his particular department, whether it be that of the piano, the violin, the harp, or any other instrument, or of any department of singing.

Add to this its all-round value as a standard work of reference on every point concerning the wide domain of music and musicians, and it will be granted that "The Musical Educator" is unique as well as complete.

TWO OPINIONS.

Sir J. FREDERICK BRIDGE.

"'The Musical Educator' is full of useful information plainly set forth. The musical illustrations are excellent."

Dr. CRISER, Mus. D. Oxon, F.R.C.O., F.T.C.L.

(Examiner in Music at Trinity College), writes:—

"We have here an illuminative work of great value, not only to the student, but also to the general reader."

... It contains excellent instructions."

"Gounod's 'Redemption' appeals to the public largely on account of the words with which the music is associated, and the same can certainly be said of 'The Messiah.' In each case the music, however, is undoubtedly a powerful factor, and the words being not only impressive, but also familiar, the listener is doubly affected. . . . Then, to speak only of Gounod's work, it is strong because it is sincere. A gifted composer, by thoughtful and deep study of the sacred story, can illustrate it in tones effectively, but more convincingly if in true sympathy with the subject—in other words, if he be religious, using that term in its widest sense. And Gounod, like Bach, and in modern times Liszt, was of a serious cast of mind, and possessor, moreover, of a strongly emotional nature."—Daily Telegraph, March 1, 1909.

"If allowances are made for the state of popular musical thought in his day, and for the undoubted sincerity with which Gounod adopted a style that suited his nature, it is possible to consider his 'Redemption' in many respects a work of high art. Melody in itself, if dissociated from unsuitable surroundings, will never fail to appeal, and broad choral effect, when secured by skilful methods, will always give pleasure. The audience that gathered on Saturday evening to hear the 'Redemption' performed by the Alexandra Palace Choral Society, under the direction of Mr. Allen Gill, showed by their number and their interested attention that the work still retains its hold."—Morning Post, March 1, 1909.

PASSION SERVICE

FOR THE SEASON OF

LENT AND GOOD FRIDAY.

"Scholarly writing, combined with unmistakable talent, and eminently adapted to the purpose for which it was written and composed. The work will probably be largely used, and Mr. Gaul has to be congratulated upon another success."—Sheffield Independent.

"The course of sacred events connected with the Passion is laid out by the writer so as to form a series of six distinct 'scenes.' The subjects of these divisions, each occupied with a particular stage of the Mystery, are respectively: 'The Traitor at the Table,' 'The Denial,' 'The Condemnation before Pilate,' 'The Mockery on Calvary,' 'The Shadow of Death,' and 'The Holy Sepulchre.' The style of the composition resembles generally that of Mr. Gaul's previous writings—the same effective, grateful part-writing, and the same expressive and melodious treatment of the solo voice. In those sections, notably that of the Unjust Condemnation, where the realistic element is predominant, the composer has manifested his ability to write with dramatic force and intensity as well as with lyric charm. In this respect the choral writing distinguished itself in comparison with that in the 'Holy City' and other of the composer's works. Mr. Gaul has not written new hymn tunes for the author's lyrics; the tunes selected are from among those in ordinary congregational use. Altogether considered, Mr. Gaul's new work will, undoubtedly, greatly enhance his already high reputation in the line of sacred composition."—Musical Standard.

Price, paper cover, 2s. 6d.; paper boards, 3s.; scarlet cloth, 4s.

Words only, 7s. 6d. per 100.

The loan of Parts for a limited Orchestra—namely, Strings, 2 Flutes, 2 Clarinets, 2 Cornets, Bass Trombone or Euphonium, and Kettledrums, may be had on application to the COMPOSER, Gillott Lodge, Edgbaston.

JOAN OF ARC

AN HISTORICAL CANTATA

FOR THREE SOLO VOICES, CHORUS AND ORCHESTRA

ALFRED R. GAUL.

"Few Cantatas are as rich in chaste melodies, charming choruses, and exquisite orchestration as Alfred R. Gaul's 'Joan of Arc,' performed for the first time in Plymouth by the Vocal Association in the Guildhall."—The Western News.

"Must enhance the high reputation of its composer."—Liverpool Courier.

"The inspiration of a highly-refined musician, . . . The Cantata is even a more masterly and beautiful work than 'The Holy City.'"—Huddersfield Examiner.

"No more charming Cantata than 'Joan of Arc' could have been chosen. It abounds in delicious music. There is not a tedious note in it."—Newcastle-on-Tyne Daily Chronicle.

"Gives the listener a vivid and realistic impression, its attractiveness being continuous instead of spasmodic."—Bradford Observer.

"The Exeter Oratorio Society last night achieved a brilliant success, and it may safely be said, without fear of exaggeration, that never before have they performed a work more satisfactory to themselves or more interesting to the audience than 'Joan of Arc.'"—Western Times.

"One of the most delightful Concerts ever given by the South Shields Choral Society was that of last evening, when the principal piece was 'Joan of Arc.' We cannot speak too highly of Mr. Gaul's work, which is of the most interesting description."—The Shields Daily News.

Price, paper cover, 2s. 6d.; paper boards, 3s.; scarlet cloth, 4s.;

Tonic Sol-fa, 1s.; Vocal parts, each, 1s.; Words only, 7s. 6d. per 100.

(Ent. Stationers' Hall.)

The loan of instrumental parts may be had on application to the Composer, and full liberty is given to perform these Cantatas and to insert the words in any programme without further permission.

A HYMN OF THE PASSION

WITH ENGLISH AND LATIN WORDS

MUSIC BY

REV. JAMES BADEN POWELL.

Price One Shilling and Sixpence.

This Cantata was published in 1902.

"This thoughtful composition should ensure acceptance."—Musical Times, Dec. 1902.

"This excellent composition is worthy the attention of churches where Passion Music is rendered during that season."—Church Times, Nov. 7, 1902.

In an account of the first performance, March 5, 1903, the Church Times also says:—"Mr. Baden Powell has certainly achieved a musical success with this impressive work."

"We can most heartily recommend this setting of the 'Pange Lingua' to all experienced choirs."—The Churchwoman, March, 1903.

"The work displays deep musical feeling: there is not a single weak air in the entire composition; it is full of interest, and while the gift of melody which is found in all Mr. Baden Powell's writings is constantly present, it is nevertheless exercised in a carefully restrained fashion, which lends great dignity to the work."—Guardian, April 19, 1905.

"The nave of Exeter Cathedral was filled last evening, when the 'Pange Lingua' ('Sing, my tongue'), a hymn of the Passi n, was admirably rendered by the full regular choir. It is a fine, scholarly composition."—Dawlish Gazette, April 14, 1906.

MERBECKE'S COMMUNION MUSIC (A.D. 1550)

Edited, with an Organ Accompaniment, by SIR CHARLES VILLIERS STANFORD. Price 6d.

The Plainsong has been carefully compared with the original, and in translating it into modern notation the note values (which are so vital to the due declamation of the words) have been scrupulously preserved. . . . The melody should be sung in unison and in free time. Accents have been placed over the important notes, which require a stress in order to make the meaning of the phrase clear. Marks of expression are added in the organ part only, and occasional alternations of men's and boys' voices are suggested for the sake of contrast and variety.—From Prefatory Note.

"A book which stands at the very head of musical literature, a book which surpasses even Spitta in intimacy of knowledge, and above all in the instinct of what to leave out."—The Times.

"This book on Bach proves to be of nothing less than national, perhaps it would be nearer the mark to say European importance. Sir Hubert shows Bach to his readers in extraordinary detail; but throughout it is his ideal, colossal personality that is presented, for the most part in a searching and always devoted analysis of his music."—Musical Times.

THE ONLY WAY TO PLAY WELL AT SIGHT.

There is one way, and one way only, to become a good sight-player. That way is by the establishing of an automatic connection between the nerves of the eye and the muscles of the arm and hand, so that at the mere sight of the notes the fingers fall instinctively upon the correct keys.

Only 3 months with 15 minutes' daily practising will establish that instantaneous connection, and enable a pianist to play AT FIRST SIGHT all music he can technically master.

Write for particulars of the Ehremayer System of Pianoforte Sight-Playing—the only System which makes sight-playing easy.

MARCH 1, 1911.

SIR HENRY J. WOOD.

No other English-born conductor has achieved such wide fame in his particular vocation as Henry J. Wood. It was therefore with much more gratification than surprise that the musical world learnt that his name was included in the list of the New Year's knights. He was the only musician thus honoured on this occasion. Such a moment in the career of an eminent man invites retrospect and an estimate, and, in view of the new knight's age, a hopeful forecast.

The chief incidents of Henry J. Wood's life are well known. Nevertheless, it will be appropriate to recapitulate them briefly here.

Henry J. Wood was born in Oxford Street, London, on March 3, 1870. He will therefore be forty-one years of age this month. His father was English, but his mother was Welsh, having been born and bred in Montgomeryshire, a fact that to one section at least of the British nation will readily account for Wood's natural musical capacity.

His father was an amateur violoncello player, and for twenty-five years was solo tenor at St. Sepulchre Church. His mother was an excellent singer, and it was she who guided and fostered his precocious musical talent. At ten years of age Master Wood was deputy organist at St. Mary's, Aldermanbury, and at seventeen he became organist and choirmaster of St. John's, Fulham. He studied for six terms at the Royal Academy of Music, where he gained four medals. In this institution, which has influenced so many well-known musicians, Sir Henry considers that he was specially indebted to the late Ebenezer Prout and Manuel Garcia. At the Fisheries' Exhibition in 1883, and at the Inventions' Exhibition in 1885, Master Wood gave organ recitals, and at this period he began to be in request as a pianoforte accompanist—a branch of musical accomplishment in which he is still distinguished. From now until 1890 he spent much time over composition, including songs, light opera and choral works.

But as his dreams of becoming a conductor took a practical shape, he resolutely abandoned the creative side of his art, and determined to confine himself to interpretation. A solitary anthem is, we believe, the only composition of this period that has been published. It was in September, 1889, that the young musician, then only nineteen years of age, began his career as a conductor. In this capacity he went on a four months' tour with Mr. Arthur Rousebey's Opera Company. His next task was to superintend the rehearsing of Sullivan's 'Ivanhoe,' which was produced in London in March, 1891. Later he was for a time at the Savoy assisting Mr. Cellier, and he was engaged for a provincial tour by the Carl Rosa Opera Company and other operatic entrepreneurs. An enterprise undertaken by Signor Lago at the Olympic Theatre exercised incalculable influence on the young conductor, who was engaged as chef. The season opened with Tchaikovsky's opera 'Eugene Onegin,' and it was undoubtedly the admiration of the Russian composer's music conceived by Wood at this period that induced that bias to the Russian School which has since been a prominent feature of his orchestral propaganda.

The Lago season was a failure financially, but it served to increase Wood's reputation. He had up to now conducted forty-six operas, grave and gay. This experience seemed to exhaust his ambition in this department of musical activity, for he resolved to abandon the theatre with all its difficulties and disappointments, and to devote himself to concert work of the highest type. He visited Bayreuth in 1894 and became acquainted with Mottl. In 1895 he was engaged by Mr. Robert Newman, then manager of the new Queen's Hall, to conduct the first series of promenade concerts given in that now famous building. These admirable concerts have been continued up to the present time, and have exercised an influence on the taste of vast numbers of the public that cannot be over-estimated. In July, 1898, Wood married Olga, the only daughter of Princess Sofie Ouroussov of Enilovka, Podolia. She had been in London studying singing under her future husband. It is outside the purpose of this article to dwell upon the admiration and respect that were soon inspired by her artistic achievements. We have only to renew the expression of sorrow and sympathy for her stricken husband that was so widely and deeply felt when she passed away on December 20, 1909.

The promenade concerts had demonstrated once again that there were in London audiences that could appreciate the finest music. This encouragement led to the establishment in 1896 of the Queen's Hall symphony concerts, and later of a series of festival concerts. At first these concerts were not exclusively served by the fine band of about one hundred performers organized by Mr. Newman and conducted by Wood. The Lamoureux Orchestra was imported from Paris for some of the festivals, and Weingartner, Ysaye, and Nikisch were among the conductors.

Wood was now placed in close comparison with the greatest living exemplars of his art, and it is enough to add that his reputation was in no degree diminished. In the ordinary season 1902-3 five tone-poems by Richard Strauss were played to a wondering and sometimes dubious public, and many other striking novelties were brought forward. Another fresh development was the establishment of Sunday concerts, which at first were perhaps not unnaturally strenuously opposed in some quarters, and which are now one of the most extraordinary features of metropolitan life on Sundays. In November, 1899, Wood visited Berlin to conduct the orchestra of the Philharmonic Society, and in 1904 he went to New York to conduct the Philharmonic Society. He has been conductor of the Nottingham Sacred Harmonic Society and the City Orchestra, and also of the Wolverhampton Festival Choral Society. These posts he was forced to resign owing to the pressure of other work. In 1902 he became conductor of the Sheffield Festival, and only recently he was appointed conductor of the Birmingham Festival. He has also since 1904 conducted the Westmorland Festival.

Sir Henry has always been deeply interested in vocal music in both solo and choral forms. He states that he studied under seventeen teachers of singing, and that from only two, Duvivier and Manuel Garcia, did he derive any special benefit. It is worthy of note that the only musical subject on which Sir Henry gives private instruction is solo singing. No doubt his experience in this department has helped him to secure the cantabile—the singing tone and style—that so often characterizes his orchestral readings. He makes the complaint, often heard in these times, that solo singers are trained in a lop-sided fashion, devoting years to production and 'placing,' and omitting to make themselves musicians.

In the matter of choral technique and interpretation Sir Henry is an expert. He denounces the jejune monotony of tone-colour which so frequently distinguishes the performances of choralists. Even a bad tone allied to moving dramatic expression is preferable to the frigid, calculated, statuesque delivery of 'nice' tone. He insists upon proper vowel definition and clear articulation of consonants as a primary necessity of choral performance. A choir can never be dull if they utter the words clearly. But the perfection of choral execution, the words, attack, rhythm, dynamic contrasts, &c., all simply serve the expression of the mood. Sir Henry endorses what many other recent observers have said, that the evolution of choral execution owes a great debt to Elgar. In his 'Dream of Gerontius' he indicated a new choral technique. It was not only new, but it was possible, and the best choralists, with the aid of skilful trainers, have now learned how to master it. The potentialities of choral effect are immense and alluring. They excite Sir Henry's prophetic vision, and he dreams of entrancing subtleties of colour and revelations of mood. The twentieth century choralist will have to be specially equipped to meet many formidable demands.

In 1904 Wood announced his intention to form a select choir of one hundred voices. The singers were to be individually and collectively trained to a high pitch of perfection, and were to perform a cappella pieces as well as works with the orchestra. The scheme was attractive, and drew many earnest and capable choralists together; but after one season's rehearsal the enterprise had to be abandoned, because the conductor could not find the time to carry out his ideals.

THE SCIENCE OF REHEARSING.

No gifts of insight, no skill in conducting, are of much avail unless they are allied to the power to rehearse scientifically. No one familiar with Sir Henry Wood's methods of work can fail to note that a large measure of his success is due to his extraordinary punctiliousness at rehearsals and in preparing for them. He leaves nothing to chance, and will constantly spend hours over band parts in order to ensure their correctness in every particular—phrasing, dynamic directions, &c. How often it is that young composers, and even composers who are old enough to know better, upset a rehearsal and the possibility of the success of their work by providing band parts that have to be corrected on the orchestra! A two hours' rehearsal of a full orchestra costs £50—that is, about eight shillings and sixpence a minute. A quarter of an hour occupied in correcting and otherwise dallying wastes £6 5s. Wood has 2,500 works in his library, every one of which he has personally edited. He has himself scored 125 arias for use at the promenade concerts and elsewhere. Modern scoring is frequently too thick for solo singers. Sir Henry says that he bears in mind Phil May's plan of drawing his pictures, in which, after employing say sixty lines, he eliminates forty. It may save disappointment to mention that Sir Henry never lends his band parts.

A remarkable example of his phenomenal painstaking is afforded by the substantial volume of 108 pages containing instructions to the Sheffield choralists as to the study of the Bach Mass in B minor, which will be given at the festival this year. Each vocal part has a separate section, and the difficulties of each chorus are dealt with page by page. At the end of each section certain special passages are printed, which are to be used as vocalises for daily practice. The following are quotations:

1ST SOPRANO.

No. 4. Gloria: p. 34, bar 12.—Don't clip dotted accented quaver D on the syllable 'glo': mark it ten. (held, pressed).

P. 35, bar 3.—Sing this with a bright, gay, smiling p. tone; also bar 3, p. 32. Never give a dull piano tone in this number: the joy and exultation must be maintained throughout in p., crescendo and f.

LITTLEHAMPTON. PAINTED BY HENRY J. WOOD.

Bar 12.—Don't try to sing 'chel' on top B: deepen and broaden the vowel very much by retracting the corners of the mouth, as as to get a shorter mouth resonance. Get the chest and the breath as high as possible for this phrase, and never mind if the word is changed into 'een x's-chal-sees.' Avoid 'chel' rhyming with 'cell.'

2ND SOPRANO.

No. 4. Gloria.—Do not sing this number too smoothly; all the quavers want to be sung in a detached, almost staccato manner, so as to give the number crispness and brilliancy, as there is not the least reason why the choruses should not sing a good staccato as well as a legato in the same manner as a pianist or a violinist uses these two touches. Put great vocal stress upon the first syllable 'Gloh'—I want this number sung with a very bright, ringing quality of tone, and be careful that the lips are only slightly funnelled over the first syllable in the word 'Gloria,' maintaining nearly the bright 'Ah' position of voice and mouth. Sing most of this number with a smiling position of the lips and mouth, as by this means forwardness, brightness of tone and ring can be obtained and maintained. Never let the first syllable in the word 'Gloria' approach 'Gloo,' and always pronounce the second syllable of the word 'ex-cel-sis' with great forced accent, and be quite sure that it tells to the public as 'chael' and not 'sell.'

CONTRALTO.

No. 11. Cum Sancto Spiritu.—The whole of this chorus to be sung with a bright, smiling, even metallic quality of tone; even in the piano there must be gaiety, life and brightness, in order to make this chorus tell as the greatest contrast to No. 8, where only the dark veiled quality of tone is utilized. Memorize the last three bars on p. 83, which runs without ritard into No. 11.

BASS.

No. 17. Et Resurrexit: p. 142.—This page always sounds thick, dull and heavy, never conveying the idea of the words, 'And again He will come with glory, judging the quick and the dead.' If the whole page is sung in five breaths it will go with much more life. Get the tone very bright and metallic; do not contract the eyebrows or even look fierce, but sing with real exultation, with the greatest vitality and brilliancy, getting the words in the teeth, the tone to be open, never dull, confidential or covered; and, most important of all, sing it from memory and look the audience straight in the face.

INTERPRETATION.

The problems of interpretation are manifold. Every executant worth his salt must to some degree intrude his own temperament into his effort to interpret the composer. No one but the composer himself can escape adding this gloss. But how far should this personality, this subjectivity, of the interpreter be permitted to assert itself? That is the unanswerable quantitative question. We can safely say that some intruders of self-expression obviously caricature a composer, and we can as well feel that another interpretation or mechanical performance exhibits no insight whatever. Between these extremes there is much scope for disagreement. Sir Henry J. Wood is a strong musical thinker, and he does not scruple to present music just as he feels it. We may not always agree with his sometimes unconventional readings, but we cannot fail to perceive their sincerity.

Apart from this matter of subjective interpretation, one of the charms of Wood's orchestral performances is their clean finish. The existing band may not be so powerful as that which seceded some years ago, and has now become the London Symphony Orchestra, but no band that Wood has ever conducted could exhibit more beautiful plasticity than that which is known as the Queen's Hall Orchestra. This responsiveness and perfection of detail were never better exemplified than in the recent performances of the orchestral parts of Elgar's Violin concerto, which, it may be noted, had been rehearsed for nine hours.

Sir Henry's physical movements in conducting deserve to be remarked. As a rule his action is restrained, and he seems to govern as much by his facial expression and the direction of his glance as by the movements of his baton. It is noticeable that in conducting his orchestra nearly all his beats are down-beats. This statement may invite some doubt, but all conductors know that the down-beat can be given in such a way that the return journey up-beat does not count. But Sir Henry says that this mere indication of pulsation is only applicable to highly-trained resources. In dealing with large choral masses his beat is duly varied in its direction.

PROGRAMMES.

The Queen's Hall programmes come in for their full share of criticism, but whatever is said it cannot be denied that they attract the public. There are mutterings that the British composer does not secure his due share of attention. Whether this is true or not it is interesting to record Sir Henry's opinion, emphatically expressed, that our young composers are splendid and better than those of any other nationality. The problem of programme-making is dealt with broadly and acutely by Mrs. Newmarch in her interesting Life of the conductor,* a book to which we are indebted for some of the information given in this article. She says:

Few people bear in mind, when judging a conductor by his programmes, that he is not invariably master of the situation, and has to gratify other tastes than his own. Unless he is running a series of subsidised concerts which have some distinctly educational or national aim in view, his first duty is to deal fairly and considerately with the paying public. A conductor must be neither a pedagogue nor a propagandist. This does not mean that he should put the names of composers into a hat and draw them out with impersonal disregard for results. He is certainly justified, within limits, in choosing the works with which he feels most sympathy. He must have a hand light enough to feel the mouth of the public, but he must not jag at the bit. There will be times when he will be doing mere justice in giving an unpopular work a second or third chance; and again, if he has established a sympathetic current between himself and his audiences, he will realise when he has gone hopelessly beyond or beneath their standard of appreciation. Concerts are given for a variety of aims and reasons, for the most part too mysterious for investigation, the soundest of them all being to impart the greatest artistic enjoyment to the greatest number, while reaping at the same time a fair return on the original outlay. This commercial view will not satisfy the superior person. Yet I feel convinced that a series of programmes drawn up on the basis of the public taste—say by plebiscite—would have a greater artistic value than one built up by a committee of cultivated ranks.

It is difficult to believe that a man who takes his professional work so seriously can find time for recreation. Yet Sir Henry has other than musical interests and occupations, the most notable of which is a passion for oil-painting. In his boyhood he showed some capacity in this direction, and his father desired him to become a painter, and to this end sent him to Heatherley's School of Art in Newman Street (London, W.), and afterwards to the Slade School of Art, where he studied under Legros. We are glad, by the permission of Sir Henry, to place before our readers a black-and-white reproduction of a Littlehampton scene he painted a year or two ago (see p. 155). Asked his impression of the post-impressionists, Sir Henry replied that after visiting the recent exhibition he went at once to the National Gallery to get the taste out of his mouth.

The arrangement of the instruments in the Queen's Hall Orchestra is unusual, all the violins (1st and 2nd) are on the left, and the violas take the customary place of the second violins on the right. The wood-wind occupy the centre of the orchestra, the brass and percussion being ranged above them. The 'cellos and basses are all on the right side, near the violas. This arrangement is explained by the desirability of grouping the instruments that generally work together in an ensemble, and, besides, it facilitates the giving of cues and economizes time at rehearsals. The underlying justification for any rational disposition of the orchestral forces is that it enables the conductor to control and the players to work in unity. If there were no conductor to consider, and no desire for perfect ensemble, something might be said for Spontini's suggestion that the string and wind players should mix miscellaneously in order that the tone might blend.

Sir Henry J. Wood is a national asset. All lovers of music will hope that he will continue for many years to minister to their education and enjoyment.

BRAHMS'S GERMAN REQUIEM.

BY ERNEST NEWMAN.

Brahms's 'German Requiem' (Op. 45) is held by some to have been written in memory of Schumann, by others in memory of the composer's mother. There is no need to decide for either theory to the total exclusion of the other, for men's minds may work to the one end under as many stimuli in art as they do in life. Max Kalbeck informs us that the chorus 'All flesh doth perish as the grass' was originally planned as the second movement (a slow, sara-band-like scherzo) of an early sonata for two pianofortes, which was afterwards re-cast as the D minor pianoforte concreto. Kalbeck holds that this concerto (Op. 15) was intended to be a memorial to Schumann, whose madness and tragic death had so deeply affected the youthful Brahms; but that not being satisfied with it, he 'erected two other monuments to the memory of Schumann, more noble in feeling and more perfect in their art,' in the C minor symphony and the 'German Requiem.' This view of the case may well be right; we know that the thoughtful young Brahms was so obsessed by the terrible fate of his friend and mentor that when he heard Beethoven's 9th Symphony for the first time, in 1856, the first movement of it seemed to speak to him directly of the Schumann tragedy. On the other hand, Madame Schumann thought that the Requiem was written in memory of Brahms's mother, although Brahms had never expressly said so; and this was the view taken by the composer's lifelong friend, Joachim, at a memorial festival at Meiningen in 1899. The mother had died in 1865. The Requiem seems to have been begun in 1866, and to have been finished—all but the fifth number, which was an afterthought—in 1867. No. 5—the aria 'Ye who now sorrow'—was written in Bonn in May, 1868, and we have Brahms's own testimony that this movement at any rate was prompted by the memory of his mother.

The first three movements of the work were given in Vienna on December 1, 1867, under Herbeck. It had a mixed reception. The first two movements received some applause, but the third was greeted with many expressions of disapproval; the continual pedal point—intensified, it is said, by the too vigorous work of the drummer—had a disagreeable effect on the audience. On Good Friday (April 10), 1868, the whole of the Requiem (except No. 5) was given in the cathedral at Bremen, under Reinthaler, the baritone solos being sung by Otto Schelper (not Stockhausen, as is commonly stated); it was repeated on the 27th of the same month—not in the cathedral this time, but at the 'Union.' In the following weeks the soprano aria was added, and the complete Requiem was given at the Leipsic Gewandhaus on February 18, 1869, under Reinecke. Numerous performances followed quickly in other German towns. It was given in English at a private meeting in Sir Henry Thompson's house in London on July 7, 1871, the orchestral part being played as a pianoforte duet by Lady Thompson and Cipriani Potter. The Requiem was also produced about this time at a students' concert of the Royal Academy of Music; but the first public performance of which we have any record is that at a Philharmonic Society's concert in St. James's Hall on April 2, 1873, under Mr. Cusins, the solos being taken by Miss Sophie Ferrari and Mr. Santley.

The 'German Requiem,' as will be seen at once, has nothing in common with the ordinary Requiem Mass; verbal purists have even disputed its claim to be called a Requiem at all, since it offers up no prayer for the dead. The text is freely selected from the Bible and the Apocrypha; the several sources of it may be indicated here:

- 1st Movement: Matthew v., 4; Psalm cxxvi., 5, 6.
- 2nd Movement: I. Peter i., 24, 25; James v., 7; Isaiah xxxv., 10.
- 3rd Movement: Psalm xxxix., 4-8; Wisdom iii., 1.
- 4th Movement: Psalm lxxxiv., 1, 2, 4.
- 5th Movement: John xvi., 22; Ecclesiasticus ii., 27; Isaiah lxvi., 13.
- 6th Movement: Hebrews xiii., 14; I. Corinthians xv., 51-55; Revelation iv., 11.
- 7th Movement: Revelation xiv., 13.

That Brahms was both an earnest thinker and an assiduous student of the Bible is evident, though it would not be wise to try to fix the exact measure of his orthodoxy. We are told by Kalbeck that 'nothing made him angrier than to be taken for an orthodox church composer on account of his sacred compositions.' Probably he was always more philosopher than theologian. When sending Herzogenberg the 'Vier Ernste Gesänge' (Op. 121) in June, 1896, he jokingly anticipated censure for his 'unchristian principles,' the texts, as Kalbeck says, being in part 'not only anti-dogmatic but irreligious' (ungläubig). Brahms's freedom from purely theological prepossessions may be seen in his correspondence with Reinthaler over the Requiem. Reinthaler, who was the organist at Bremen Cathedral, urged him to make the work more definitely orthodox. 'It occupies,' he says in a letter of October 5, 1867, 'not only religious but purely Christian ground. The second number deals with the prediction of the return of the Lord, and in the last number but one there is express reference to the mystery of the resurrection of the dead, "We shall not all sleep." For the Christian mind, however, there is lacking the point on which everything turns, namely the redeeming death of Jesus. Perhaps the passage "Death, where is thy sting?" would be the best point at which to introduce this idea, either briefly in the movement itself, before the fugue, or in a new movement. Moreover you say in the last movement "Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord from henceforth," that is to say, after Christ has finished the work of redemption.' Brahms's reply is that he is writing for humanity as a whole, and has deliberately passed over verses like that of John iii., 16, while he has selected others 'because I am a musician, because I needed them, because I cannot dispute the "from henceforth" of my revered poets, or strike it out,' which, reading between the lines, seems to mean simply that the Requiem is intended to be a human document rather than a theological argument. The text voices the perennial fluctuations of the human spirit between fear and hope, and its longing for consolation. The work has been accused of lack of unity, and in one sense, perhaps, rightly. Dramatic or fictive unity—which is the kind the critics of the Requiem have in view—is not easily attained in composite works of this kind; it might be possible to rearrange the grouping of one or two of the numbers without doing serious damage to the work. Nor is the ending above criticism. The chorus, 'Lord, Thou art worthy of praise and glory,' is so powerful that one at first feels the real climax to have come here, and that the final chorus has only been added because of the impossibility of ending a Requiem in a mood of jubilation. But the point is hardly worth worrying over; and certainly not only does the work end poetically in the only way we could possibly feel to be the right one, but it is exquisitely and touchingly rounded off by a return to the thematic material of the opening chorus. Musically, at any rate, the unity of the Requiem is beyond dispute.

Brahms was one of the select few whom we feel to be thinkers in music; his whole work embodies a philosophy of life none the less definite for not being expressed, or perhaps expressible, in words. And the philosophy is fundamentally that of his great forerunner, Bach. Like Bach, he is almost perpetually obsessed by the idea of death—much of the finest music of each of them is evoked by this theme; but, again like Bach, he faces the great problem bravely, and emerges from the contest with it all the stronger in himself, and with a message of divine consolation for us. He is of the chosen ones whose philosophy holds good for all time because it sublimates the deepest experiences of the race. His gloom is an intellectual and spiritual thing, not a fever of the nerves. Tchaikovsky and Chopin—to take these two examples alone—have sung their griefs in exquisite strains; but who does not feel that the sorrow is too personal to be universal, too purely physical in its origin to be a sane reading of the whole of existence? We feel at times that a robuster frame, a happier life, or even a dose of phenacetin would have cured it all. For the heart-ache of men like Bach and Brahms there is no cure. Theirs is a cosmic grief, the grief not of a sick mind, but of one fundamentally strong and healthy. And being woven not out of the nerves but out of the firmer tissues of the spirit, it always carries its own healing with it. In all Brahms's philosophical work the bitterness is finally bracing or consoling, not corroding or shattering; always the stream of pure water wells up somewhere through the brine; never does he let us see his face tear-stained at the last, as Tchaikovsky and Chopin so often do. In the 'Alto Rhapsody' and the 'Vier Ernste Gesänge' the final note, for all the despair and gloom that have gone before, is one of exquisite consolation; in the 'Song of Destiny' he even alters fundamentally the conception of the poet, laying a kind of balm upon the spirit that has been tempted to such passionate revolt against the tangled scheme of things. And in the Requiem the consolation always comes hard upon the heels of the despair. And such consolation! a giant's tenderness, all the more touching because of the strength we know to be behind it, a caress from a great hand that could crush us if it would. Perhaps there are no passages in the whole work more wonderful than these. It is not the mere poetic scheme of contrasted black and white, shadow and sunlight, that is so impressive; any poetaster could have arranged that. It is the quality of the consoling music that follows such drastic, grisly paintings of the nothingness of man as the 'All flesh doth perish as the grass' * and the 'Lord, make me to know what the measure of my days may be.' In both these pictures Brahms reaches back in soul, as he so often does, to the very foundations of the northern Teutonic spirit. The Latins do not conceive death like this; it is the mood of a race like our own, to which physical nature has been unkind, that has mourned and shivered through many a sunless and niggard day, and had its very bones cankered by the damp of the earth. In just such tones as Brahms did the old poet of the Edda sing of the physical horror of the descent into the grave, not only the recoil of the spirit from death but the shrinking of the warm body from the clasp of the soddened earth:

For thee was a house built ere thou wert born; for thee was a mould shapen ere thou of thy mother camest. Its height is not determined, nor its depth measured; nor is it closed up (however long it may be) until I thee bring where thou shalt remain: until I shall measure thee and the sod of the earth. Thy house is not highly built; it is unhigh and low. When thou art in it, the heel-ways are low, the side-ways unhigh. The roof is built thy breast full nigh; so thou shalt in earth dwell full cold, dim and dark. Doorless is that house, and dark it is within. There thou art fast detained, and Death holds the key. Loathly is that earth-house, and grim to dwell in. There thou shalt dwell, and worms shall share thee. Thus thou art laid, and leavest thy friends. Thou hast no friend that will come to thee, who will ever inquire how that house liketh thee, who shall ever open for thee the door and seek thee, for soon thou becomest loathly and hateful to look upon.

* The proper effect of this is generally lost in performance. Brahms must have omitted the sopranos and written the altos and basses so low in order to get a particularly sombre, sepulchral colour; but the tenors, who are in their middle register, usually sing so loudly that the tone-colour is of the normal brightness. The tenor tone should surely be covered up by that of the darker voices.

In the 'Lord, make me to know what the measure of my days may be,' there is added to this grim old Saxon sense of the horror of the grave the moral austerity of a Hebrew prophet. Yet grievous, terrible as these moods are, they are not the last, but only the first word with Brahms; for every hurt he has an anodyne. 'Could there be music more full of the purest spirit of consolation than that of the lovely choral snatches interspersed among the darker choruses or that of the chorus 'How lovely are Thy dwellings,' or that of the soprano aria 'Ye who now sorrow'? The high tessitura of the aria makes it a trial to the singer; but is there not in its very height a suggestion of a consoling angel hovering above our heads, and in the final unresolved cadence of the voice is there not the idea of the heavenly visitant disappearing from our eyes while still poised in the air? And when, having done both with grief and with consolation, Brahms turns to triumph over death, how deep-throated is his exultation! Where in music is there so cosmic a cry over death vanquished as at the end of the chorus 'Now death is swallowed up in victory,' with its ineffable joy of combat in the surging phrases at 'Death, where is thy sting,' and the challenging roar upon the reiterated 'Where'? Again, in the gigantic choral fugue 'But the souls redeemed are in the hand of God,' what steadfastness there is in the persistent pedal, and what unconquerable exultation in the ocean-like roll of the voices at the finish! But at the very end of the work the thinker comes uppermost again. Brahms closes in a chastened, though hopeful mood—not alone because the title of 'Requiem' demands such an ending, but because the philosopher knows that our ultimate hope can only be not for triumph over life but for tranquillity in death—'Yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labours; and their works do follow them.'

Brahms, again like Bach, was reticent in private life; scarcely a saying or a letter survives of either of them in which the man bares his real soul. This type of mind lives wholly inwardly; its mental and moral struggles are carried on too far down beneath the surface of the spirit for the world to know anything of the causes or the incidents of the combat. But when they utter themselves in their art, the expression is all the greater for the habitual concentration of the man. So it is that we get works like the 'German Requiem,' which, the more we study them, seem the more incomparably to give voice to all our own profoundest thoughts upon life and death. And the appeal of such works cannot diminish until humanity itself alters; philosophy of this kind endures like the noble metals and the hills.

"CARACTACUS" NOT ARNE'S.

BY WILLIAM H. CUMMINGS.

The current number of the Quarterly Magazine of the International Musical Society has an article with the above title, in which my opinion as to the authenticity of the music attributed to Arne is referred to. I read a paper at the Musical Association on Arne in March, 1910, and on that occasion carefully abstained from mentioning 'Caractacus'; but I have never had a doubt that the music printed and erroneously ascribed to him is the composition of some incompetent amateur. Mr. Sonneck, the writer of the essay in the Quarterly Magazine, suggests that it may have been the work 'of some English organist, whose skill, experience, and talent as a composer did not measure up to his ambition.' I cannot agree with this; the music is absolutely childish, and too poor to be accredited to any man with a moderate knowledge of music. Take, for instance, the 'General Instructions for the Performance of the Instrumental Music.' 'The band should be large. There must be trombones for the symphonies of the last act. In those symphonies in which the upper part lies-on, while the middle or lower part moves, care must be taken that such middle or lower part be distinctly heard. The shakes are to be performed by one instrument only; the others, when any, in unison with it, to lie on.' A musician need only look at the first page of the printed score to determine at once that the author had no experience of writing or even copying music. The second page has music for the harp which would sound absurd when played on that instrument. There are in three staves three glaring errors of wrong notes. On page 9 there is a movement for strings with notifications that the 'organ to play in unison with all the parts' and also 'the shakes on the organ'; but, curiously, there is not a single indication for a shake in the score. There are some directions which I confess I do not understand—for instance, in No. 6:

What can usual pitch mean?

This example of the music will suffice. As a whole, it presents such a mass of rubbish that one scarcely has patience to read it. I need hardly say that consecutives abound. Arne had a long and varied experience in writing for the orchestra; his acknowledged works prove that he was well acquainted with the capabilities of the various instruments. In 1762 he had produced his 'Artaxerxes,' in which he made admirable use of the harp as an accompaniment to the voice supplemented by the violins pizzicato; in the same opera the flutes, horns, trumpet, and bassoon are used with great skill, the latter frequently playing independent parts, not, as usual, doubling the violoncello or bass. He did write music for 'Caractacus,' which was produced at Covent Garden Theatre on December 6, 1776, four years after 'Artaxerxes,' and was most favourably received by the public. Dr. Samuel Arnold, who was at the time composing for Covent Garden, has borne testimony to the merit of Arne's music as being full of vigour and imagination; he further, in after years, deplored the fact that Arne's music was lost. Dr. Thomas Busby, who was very intimate with Dr. Arnold, has recorded in several works the well-known fact that Arne's music appeared to be irretrievably lost, and explained the circumstances thus: 'One of the latest and finest of Dr. Arne's theatrical compositions was an opera called "Caractacus," founded on the piece of that name written by Mason. Every portion of the music (as the late Dr. Arnold informed the compiler of this work) evinced a vigour and warmth of imagination worthy of the flower of early manhood. At Dr. Arne's decease, this production came into the possession of his son, Mr. Michael Arne, who unfortunately sold the manuscript to Harrison, a bookseller in Paternoster Row, who becoming a bankrupt before the piece was published, it was publicly sold, together with his other effects (to whom it is not now known), and never has been heard of since.'

Internal evidence contained in the music itself and this corroborative testimony of Arnold and Busby of the loss of Arne's music would suffice to prove that the score under discussion could not have been his.

It was published anonymously without title page, printer's or publisher's name, and no place or date of issue. Mr. Sonneck, in the Magazine, points out the important fact that the watermark in the paper on which the music is printed is 1794. This can be seen in my own copy and also in that in the British Museum. In 1794 Arne had been dead for sixteen years, and the preparatory letter to the printed score, evidently addressed to Mason, the author of the libretto, shows that the composer was a living person who signed himself 'with the respect due to your age and character, The Author.' There can be no doubt that the music was the product of some poor man whose vaulting ambition o'er-leapt itself.

THE INTERNATIONAL MUSICAL CONGRESS, LONDON, MAY 29 TO JUNE 3.

MEETING AT THE MANSION HOUSE.

This important scheme is taking definite shape and is now well placed before the country. The meeting held in the Mansion House on February 15 was in every way stimulating, although it was unhappily deprived of the much-anticipated presence and support of the President of the Congress, Mr. A. J. Balfour, who to the deep regret of all present was compelled by domestic affliction to abandon his generous intention to speak.

The nexus that bound all the speakers and elicited the warm applause of the audience was the prospect that British music would derive great benefit from the holding of the Congress in London. It is now abundantly clear that the only rational course for the committee to adopt in view of the whole circumstances of the event was to endeavour to make it a great and memorable festival of British music. Already more than a score of our living native composers have responded to the invitation to contribute their works to the orchestral and other programmes, and composers of other periods will also be well represented.

About 300 of the leading members of the profession and many persons of social distinction accepted the Lord Mayor's invitation to be present. The list is too long for us to give in full, but it may be as well to record that besides the speakers it included:

The Rt. Hon. The Earl of Lonsborough, The Rt. Hon. Lord Blyth, The Rt. Hon. Lord and Lady Arthur Hill, The Rt. Hon. Lady Northcote, The Rt. Hon. The Earl of Clonmell, Sir Edgar Speyer, The Hon. Richard Strutt, The Rt. Hon. Stuart Wortley, M.P., Sir Ernest Clarke, Sir William Bigge, Sir Alexander B. W. Kennedy, Sir Gilbert Parker, Sir William Lancaster, Sir John Cockburn, The Archdeacon of London, The Rev. Canon Edgar Sheppard, Ian Malcolm, Esq., Col. Somerville, Lieut.-Col. A. Balfour, Rev. H. C. de Lafontaine, Philip Agnew, Esq., Alfred H. Littleton, Esq., W. W. Cobbett, Esq., Ernest Palmer, Esq., Rev. F. W. Galpin, W. Hugh Spottiswoode, Esq., Hugh Wyatt, Esq., Edward Cutler, Esq., Edward Speyer, Esq., Dr. T. Lea Southgate, Edward J. Dent, Esq., Edward German, Esq., Clifford B. Edgar, Esq., Dr. W. H. Hadow, Dr. Charles Maclean, Dr. W. G. McNaught, A. H. Manners, Esq., J. A. Fuller-Maitland, Esq., S. Myerscough, Esq., Dr. Fr. Niecks, W. Barclay Squire, Esq., Herbert Sullivan, Esq., Sir Frederick Bridge, Dr. Varley Roberts, Sir Charles Stanford, Dr. W. H. Cummings, Tobias Matthay, Esq., Lieut. Mackenzie Rogan, Dr. C. Harford Lloyd, Oscar Beringer, Esq., A. Visetti, Esq., A. Randegger, Esq., Tito Mattei, Esq., Frederick Corder, Esq., Thomas Beecham, Esq., Landon Ronald, Esq., Dr. G. R. Sinclair, Francesco Berger, Esq., William Wallace, Esq., Dr. Vaughan Williams, Dr. Alcock, and the Masters of many City Companies.

The meeting was held in the Egyptian Hall under the presidency of the Lord Mayor, Sir T. Vezey Strong, who has always displayed interest in musical progress.

The following is a full report of the proceedings:

THE LORD MAYOR said:—My Lords, Ladies and Gentlemen: I have to announce that letters of regret have been received from the following: Sir James Dewar, Sir Joseph Dimsdale, Hon. Alexander Nelson Hood, Earl Howe, The Duchess of Norfolk, Sir Arthur Pinero, Mr. Louis N. Parker, Lord Rayleigh, Sir John Murray Scott, Lord Shaftesbury, Mr. Lionel de Rothschild, Mr. James Boyton, M.P., The Lord Chief Justice, the Rt. Hon. Sir Arthur Bigge, Sir Edward Elgar, Lord Strathcona, and many others.

I have pleasure in asking Sir Alexander Mackenzie to make his opening statement explanatory of the aims and objects of the Congress.

SIR ALEXANDER MACKENZIE said:—A few explanatory facts, very briefly told, regarding the status, objects and hopes of the International Musical Society may be of some service at this early stage of our proceedings. Since its formation eleven years ago, this Society's membership (and a very distinguished roll of thoroughly representative names it is) has increased in a most surprising and encouraging manner, and its influence is now so widely spread that local sections all working for the furtherance of its aims are distributed over no less than seventeen countries, practically the globe. The main purposes for which it exists are in the first place the publication of magazines, journals, papers and reports on all subjects connected with the science and art of music, and, next, to meet in Congress at intervals for the purpose of lectures and discussions, and other musical purposes. But the dominant motive (and it is one which we all have very much at heart), the great underlying idea which pervades the spirit of the Society, is to draw musicians and musical connoisseurs into closer individual contact (Applause), and to foster a wider knowledge and a better understanding of the nature of the art of their respective countries: in fact, to establish that desirable friendly and personal intercourse which we all know is so valuable to progress. The success which has so speedily attended our endeavours has wholly justified the existence of the Society, and the beneficial results which have already been achieved are obvious.

The first Congress was held in Leipsic, another took place at Bale a little more than two years ago, while the last took place at Vienna in 1909 and was synchronous with a great and most interesting national event, namely, the centenary of the death of Joseph Haydn. There may be some in this room who will recollect with pleasure the exceptional brilliance and impressiveness of that memorable week's functions. The Austrian Court and State and also the Municipality of the capital vied with each other in providing many most brilliant and artistic displays in every branch of the art, and also a long sequence of most lavish hospitality. At the conclusion of that Congress a wish was unanimously expressed by the members that the next should take place in London. I think you will all agree with me that the suggestion of itself was an honour, and I, greatly daring, took it upon myself to accept the responsibility there and then, not only on behalf of our English Section, but in the name of British music (Applause).

Now although we all know that very different conditions regarding our art obtain here, we felt and we knew that our call would be heard and answered, and these hopes, I am happy to say, have not been disappointed. Thanks to the ready and generous response of many lovers of music, and also of many of my professional colleagues long before this meeting was announced or even thought of, we were enabled to make not only the necessary preliminary moves, but to complete certain definite arrangements for the general scheme of entertainment which we are bound to offer to our foreign guests. I should regret if you understood that I mean to convey that we are quite safely out of the financial wood. It is not so, and if any of the distinguished speakers who are to follow me care to touch on that delicate point, I am sure it will greatly enhance my admiration of their eloquence.

Now in accepting the proposal of a meeting in London, I was not able to point to any special commemorative celebration or festival such as I have mentioned as having taken place at Vienna. No amount of historic research or ingenuity has succeeded in connecting the date of our Congress with any particularly noteworthy event in our own musical past; but while I hope we have endeavoured to provide due and worthy representation of some of the great music of bygone times, we have promised an exhibition of the native efforts of our own day and hour.

Now this must not be forgotten. This is the first International Congress in connection with music which has ever been held in this country, and, apart from the customary statutory constitutional functions of a scientific nature generally, which are of course obligatory so far as the Society is concerned, the musical and other entertainments are of our own choosing, and the event, we are all agreed, affords a rare opportunity of showing our own friends and guests how this country is progressing, and how keenly her musicians have been working to take their equal place among the nations (Applause). I think the occasion might go very far to dispel the residue of a gradually disappearing mist. It might afford a somewhat clearer and brighter view, and bring about a fairer recognition of much worthy and honest endeavour which has been put forth in this country in every department of the art of music (Applause). We must all sing in unison, and I feel sure that all the friends of music will give their aid in stamping this unique occurrence with complete success and will help in the writing of a most important chapter in the history of English music (Loud applause).

THE LORD MAYOR then said that but for a bereavement, which they all so much regretted, Mr. Balfour, to whom their sympathies went out, would have been there to have moved the next Resolution. In these circumstances, Lord Plymouth had most kindly undertaken to move the Resolution, and he had pleasure in calling upon him to address the meeting on that subject.

LORD PLYMOUTH (who was received with great applause) said:—It is with very great regret, I am sure, we have all listened to those few words of the Lord Mayor. It is not only that I feel myself a very unworthy substitute for the Member for the City of London on this occasion, but I know, as the Lord Mayor has said, that every one in this hall desires to express sympathy with Mr. Balfour and his family.

The Resolution which I have been invited to move really makes two propositions. It is:

'THAT this meeting heartily approves of the scheme of the Congress and of the action hitherto taken by the executive committee, and desires them to continue the work on the lines indicated in the prospectus.'

There are two propositions involved. First, that we approve of the scheme of the Congress, and, second, that we approve of the action of the executive committee. As to the first proposition I do not think there can be a doubt in the minds of any of us that it is of very great value and for the benefit of art (and I take it in its widest sense) that there should be international comparisons, so that the particular direction in which those interested in a branch of art in any country may not be isolated, but may welcome discussion with those who are engaged in promoting the art in the other countries near and around. It may be that we are following our own way, and it may be that that way is a good way; but I venture to think, unless we have the means for this comparison and this interchange of opinion to which I have referred, that way must inevitably be narrow. So much, then, for the value of an International Congress. But I think the main part of my Resolution is contained in the second proposition, in which we are asked to approve the action of the executive committee, and to desire them to continue in the direction they have already taken (Applause).

Now I think that people are always prone to take others at their own valuation. It is, as we have heard from Sir Alexander Mackenzie, the intention of the executive committee to seize this opportunity of a great gathering of musicians from far and wide in this country, to place the achievements of British music and British musicians in as favourable a light as possible. I do believe this, that if in the past British music has not received all the recognition that many of us think it has deserved, it is to a great extent the fault of our public. It is not, to my mind, the fault of musicians in this country and those who have devoted their lives to music. I do not think it can be said that we are unappreciative of good music, but I believe that it may be said that we are uncritical as a public, that we are inclined to mistrust our own independent judgment and to follow tradition and fashion in our musical likings. I think it must be admitted that we are something like the proverbial flock of sheep: where one goes through a gap the whole flock follow. I do not believe for a moment that those (I will not mention individual names) who have done so much of late years for raising the musical appreciation of a very much wider public in this country than I believe many of us thought existed, those who have drawn large audiences by giving them at very cheap prices the very best of music, would say that they found an unmusical public. Let us not take our own national music at a lower valuation than it is worth (Hear, hear). I have often resented the tendency of the public in this country to refuse to recognize some of the best lyrical music (and I will take only that side of it for the moment, not perhaps greater works), that is, taking lyrical music in a wide sense, and have accepted very inferior stuff under a foreign name (Applause). We ought to exercise an independent judgment, so far as it is given to us to do so, and we ought to admit that there is much in English music which is worthy of comparison with the very best which has been produced elsewhere. Without conceit let us say to our foreign friends who come here, 'We are not only going to give you, as far as we can, of our best, but we are going to endeavour to prove the justice of our claim.'

I trust and I feel sure that under the direction of the executive committee a very great opportunity will be seized of setting English music into the position it ought to hold. I therefore invite you in accepting this Resolution to give your hearty approval to the work that the executive committee has already done, and to ask you to join with me in hoping they will proceed on these lines and carry to a most successful termination the great Congress which is shortly going to meet.

THE LORD MAYOR said he had the honour to call upon a very welcome visitor to the Mansion House, Lord Redesdale, to second this Resolution.

LORD REDESDALE said:—My Lord Mayor, I desire first of all to associate myself most cordially with the words which have fallen from the Lord Mayor and from Lord Plymouth in expressing regret at the absence to-day of the great statesman who was to have charmed you by his eloquence (Applause). But, although he is not here to-day, I think you will all agree with me that the mere fact of his having promised to devote a certain modicum of his precious time to attend this meeting is of itself a tribute to the worthiness of the cause which we are here to advocate, and a testimony of the importance of the work which you are all desirous of putting on a good, sound basis (Applause).

I was looking this morning at the list of foreign countries which have joined this movement, and I was struck with one noteworthy absence. It was a matter of regret to me that I did not see in the list of foreign countries one country with which in old days I was very much associated. I dare say it may surprise you that I should bring this forward, because when I first went out to Japan, forty-five years ago. I am sorry to say Japan was still in the trammels of that mysterious Chinese music which proved to be a puzzle to so learned a man as Dr. Hewell, the great Master of Trinity.

That extraordinary form of music which puzzled Dr. Hewell, and which is so cacophonous to Western ears, was the system which in the old days the Japanese laboured under. When I went back to Japan five years ago, I found that all that was changed. It is true that in the privacy of their houses the ladies of Japan still played upon that curious long harp which lies upon the floor and the geishas still tinkled upon their little guitars, but officially the Chinese music was dead. The Japanese have adopted European music. The military bands all play upon European instruments, and are trained by European professors or pupils of European professors. I attended a concert in the great park of Ooyeno, where we had a full orchestra of European instruments playing Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Mozart, and, wonder of wonders, Wagner. So you see there is some reason in my bringing forward Japan as having entered not only the comity of nations, which it has done, but also the comity of musicians; and I have no doubt that if a representation were made to the Japanese Ambassador by those who are organizing this Congress, Japan would be ready to take her place alongside of us, and to show her appreciation of Western music, and, let me add, of English music.

The object that we have here to-day in encouraging the advent of foreign musicians among us is to remove prejudices. Lord Plymouth has dealt very ably with that subject, and I would only venture to add a few words to what he said, because I happen during the last few days to have come across a book by a German author of the name of Bleibtreu, who apparently is himself anxious to do all justice to England. He gives you an imaginary conversation between an Englishman and a German, and when he comes to the question of art, the imaginary German, not Mr. Bleibtreu himself, says: 'The Britons are above all a practical people, mere brutal realists in contrast to our beloved German idealists.' Mr. Bleibtreu, who was anxious to remove these prejudices from the minds of the somewhat heavy Germans whom he was addressing, is willing to give us all credit in the matter of painting, none in the matter of sculpture, very little in the case of architecture—and that only in the case of Westminster Abbey and a few examples of that sort; but when he comes to music even Mr. Bleibtreu, who is in a sense our apologist, says: 'England has never risen above the level of Sullivan's comic operas.' It is strange that a Bleibtreu can find nothing more to say of English music than that: 'We want now to remove prejudices; we want to be destructive, but at the same time we want to be constructive. We desire foreigners to come here, and hear the best music that modern England can provide, and that they should become familiar with such names as Elgar, Parry, Cowen, Mackenzie, and other names which you will easily supply. Not only that, but I hope they will be introduced to some of our Church music in England, which is so beautiful and so touching, and which appeals to the very heart of Englishmen, and which, appealing as it does to us, could not fail to touch them also.'

Ladies and Gentlemen, these prejudices of the German remind me of a story which I will venture to tell you. A great many years ago a number of us were sitting around a table, and there was a number of Germans present who had been talking much about the nullity of England in the matter of art. There happened to be present an old friend of mine, Rudol

Lindau, a man who knew the English thoroughly. He was one of Prince Bismarck's best men, and one of the most trusted men in the German Foreign Office. When these men who were sitting around the table had said their say, Lindau very quietly, in a sarcastic manner which was common to him, said, 'Yes, gentlemen, all Englishmen have red hair.' The men round the table looked up with a certain amount of astonishment. He said, 'You have a living proof before you. Look at our friend there,' pointing to me, 'can you have a better example of a most pronounced red-haired man?' There was not another word said after that. The sarcasm went straight home. The German gentlemen did not dare to say another word against England, or to lump Englishmen together in the category of nullities.

I beg to second the Motion which my noble friend, Lord Plymouth, has so ably brought before you, and I feel sure that whatever success this meeting which we propose to hold in the summer may have will be very far-reaching, and will remove many prejudices and, what is quite as important, will cement many friendships (Applause).

The Resolution was put to the meeting, and carried unanimously.

SIR HOMEWOOD CRAWFORD in moving the next Resolution said:—I find myself placed this morning in a very awkward position, because I am put upon this platform to make an appeal to you for funds. I remember once being present at a Church meeting at which we had a most eloquent discourse. When it was completed the meeting was about to disperse, when some one got up and said, 'What a pity it is we cannot have a collection!'

Now, my Lord Mayor, I do not propose to-day to have a collection in your hospitable home, but what I am going to do as a member of the executive committee, and really by the command of the executive committee, is to ask some of you who are present here to-day, and who have not hitherto put down your names as guarantors, to be good enough to do so, because if we are to carry out the aims, the special purposes, of this Congress, we can only do so if we are very thoroughly backed up with financial help.

Now why is it that we are justified in making this appeal this morning? It strikes me that one reason is we want to make a due and proper return for the hospitality which has been shown our fellow-countrymen in various countries. You have heard from Sir Alexander Mackenzie that there have been Congresses held in several foreign countries, in which there has been lavish hospitality shown to British musicians. You have also heard from Sir Alexander Mackenzie that he took upon himself, at Vienna, to extend a hearty welcome to those connected with that Congress to come to London during this memorable year in order that they might be entertained by British musicians. That being so, it only behoves all of us who take an interest in the art of music to rally round the executive committee of this Society, and to place them in such a position that they can show hospitality to those who will honour us with their presence.

Another reason, and I think it is the main reason, is that we want to have an opportunity of showing that we are distinctly a musical nation, and that we can hold our own with regard to British music (Hear, hear). Nothing annoys me more than the way in which I get bombarded with circulars offering the services of this or that orchestra in this or that particular uniform, as if the playing of music depended upon the particular garb of the instrumentalists. I hope that those who take an interest in British music will do something to aid British composers and British performers to uphold that art. I see before me in this hall, this morning, a gentleman who has done as much as a great many people towards encouraging British music. I refer to my friend Mr. Ernest Palmer, the founder of the Patron's Fund, a fund which is being admirably administered by the Royal College of Music, and which has already done very much for young musicians, particularly English composers. May I also remind you that we have already given proof to foreign nations that our British musicians can actually hold their own. I need only remind you of the very recent occasion when the chairman of the executive committee was invited to Vienna to conduct one of his admirable works, and the very warm reception that was accorded to Sir Alexander Mackenzie and the encomiums which were justly passed upon him in connection with that work.

I beg you to assent to the proposition:

'THAT this meeting invites further guarantors to come forward in order to increase the financial stability of the undertaking.'

My Lord Mayor, it would not be just that I should put this Resolution before this meeting under any false pretences. I do not assume for one moment in asking you to be guarantors to tell you that you will not be called upon to fulfil a portion of that guarantee. I see the deputy chairman, Mr. Alfred H. Littleton, is the Worshipful Master of the Musicians' Company, and I hope that I am addressing members connected with our ancient livery guilds, because I want to make an appeal to them especially to give us assistance. An example has been set them by the Worshipful Company of Musicians. I am proud to think that when I came to look at the guarantee fund, which amounts at the present time, I think, to something like £8,500, that at least one-half of the sum has been found by members of the Musicians' Company, of which I am proud to think that I am a Past-Master. I congratulate the Musicians' Company on having set such an example to the livery guilds, and I implore the big livery guilds who are blessed with funds to rally round us to-day.

MR. C. E. RUBE, in seconding the Resolution, said:—I stand before you in the unenviable position of treasurer to the Congress. I wish to say on this occasion, which as you know is a public appeal to those who love and admire British music, and who consider it an honour that London has been chosen for the holding of the Congress, that although that circle which is more closely connected with music has very generously responded to our private appeal, I, as treasurer, have reluctantly been compelled in committee several times to veto suggestions and proposals. We have had to frame our budget on most conservative lines, and to leave undone things which we should like to do. In these times of taxation and super-taxation one feels naturally diffident to ask; but we all hope that our appeal to-day will bear fruit, and that we shall be in a position to do in London what has been done at previous Conferences on the Continent. I have much pleasure in seconding the Resolution.

The Resolution was put to the meeting, and carried unanimously.

SIR HUBERT PARRY then said:—Mr. Balfour is so thoroughly appreciated by everyone of every party, so generally almost loved, that we cannot help having in our thoughts the bereavement from which he is suffering. His absence does make a very great gap, not only because we know him generally to be so sympathetic to music, but also that his presence is representative of a great and characteristically English party, and he occupies a position in the eyes of the world that can hardly be equalled by any other name you can mention (Hear, hear). I think at the moment it is very important that the enlightened foreigner should be assured that this particular Congress of ours is a representative thing, a thing in which the nation takes interest, and it is not a thing which is being run by some hole-and-corner musicians for their own benefit. If Mr. Balfour had been here, the world would have learned that the nation took really some genuine pride in having the Congress here. What Lord Plymouth and Lord Redesdale have said brings to our mind the fact that foreigners do not know much about our musical condition and the affairs of our country. We have an inexhaustible passion for musical foreigners. It is quite inexhaustible apparently; but the funny thing is, that it is said that we are an unmusical nation (Laughter and applause). Of course it is hardly necessary to follow out the inference. But that, however, as it were throws a light on the attitude which has been adopted by the executive committee in connection with the point that Lord Plymouth has mentioned, that we intend to refrain from giving them any of that which they have too much of when they are at home. Of course they come here for information, they come here to learn things that they do not know, so that it will not be much use giving them all sorts of music which they hear at home. We want to give them some curiosities they are not aware of. If we only give them what they already know, there would be a great risk of their being bored, and we do not want to bore them.

We are very much indebted to Lord Plymouth for filling the gap to-day. We know him as a man who is always associated with the best artistic schemes. Everything which is sound is sure to be backed up by Lord Plymouth, and he is here as a guarantee to the foreigner and everybody that we are a really representative show.

Lord Redesdale has said something about the Japanese. Sir Alexander Mackenzie has given me an opportunity of saying that Lord Redesdale's anticipation that the Japanese are not going to take any part in the Congress is fortunately not true, because steps have already been taken to communicate with the Empire that at this Congress Japan shall be worthily represented (Applause). I am not altogether so pleased at their taking up Western music. It is all very well for Lord Redesdale to talk about their music being cacophonous to Western ears. It does not appear to be anything of the sort. And as for their scale being cacophonous, it certainly cannot approach in the most distinct degree our latest discovery, the so-called whole-tone scale, which may possibly occupy a conspicuous place in the discussions of the Congress. We are bound to have that. I think the Japanese scale is preferable, and I think Japanese music is very interesting, and I hope they will not try to play Wagner, Mozart, Beethoven, and all those people. The extraordinary thing about it is that Oriental nations are perfectly capable of playing any amount of the greatest trash we can produce, and they play it by the yard. For instance, the Gurka regiments play it splendidly, but as soon as they have played it they go back to their own music, and that is the music which concerns them. To appreciate great European music you have to go through the process of developing the mind. It is of no real use for Orientals; but by all means let them come and understand it, and they will be all the wiser. But do not suppose the world is going to gain anything if you make all the Chinese play Richard Strauss. I think you will be ready to accord warm thanks to Lord Plymouth for bringing his presence and sympathy to our aid at this meeting (Applause).

DR. CUMMINGS in seconding the Resolution said:—I have been asked since I arrived here to take the place of Sir Edward Elgar. It is a very pleasant duty indeed to perform, to second a vote of thanks to Lord Plymouth for so kindly coming at this juncture. I recognize, as you all do, that music is essential to a nation, and to all nations. That is a fact which has been patent for the last three or four hundred years, and therefore we rejoice that anything can be done to promote music and the practice of music. We recognize that it is an elevating thing, it is a national thing, it is necessary for the nation, and we are also glad to know that our brethren who live in European countries are becoming acquainted with our music. I was not able to go to the Congress in Vienna, unfortunately, although I was nominated as the chairman for one of those meetings; but I have the honour to be a vice-president of this International Society, Sir Alexander Mackenzie being a president. Therefore I take a very great interest in it. I second the vote of thanks which we are offering to Lord Plymouth for kindly coming on this occasion.

The motion was put to the meeting, and carried unanimously.

LORD PLYMOUTH in reply said:—I know that we all would have been anxious to pass a vote of thanks to the president of the Congress of 1911, Mr. A. J. Balfour, if he could have been present. I consider it an honour to have been asked, and most unworthily and inadequately have tried to fill that gap; but I am deeply grateful to you, to Sir Hubert Parry, and Dr. Cummings for your kindness to me in passing this Resolution.

SIR ERNEST CLARKE then said:—The previous items of the programme have been of the nature of duets. The last item on the programme is a solo, a very short one, and a grand chorus in unison at the end. We all know our Lord Mayor. There have been a great succession of Lord Mayors interested in art and literature, and our present Lord Mayor is in no wit less in the public eye for the fostering of all those departments of public usefulness as his predecessors (Hear, hear). We are greatly indebted to him for spending this hour of his very precious time in allowing us to plead the cause of the International Musical Congress in this historical hall; therefore my solo is that the best thanks of this meeting be given to the Lord Mayor for presiding on this occasion, and for allowing this meeting to take place at the Mansion House. Will you kindly now give the chorus?

The motion was received with great applause.

THE LORD MAYOR in acknowledging the vote said:—I am much obliged to you for accepting the admirable solo of Sir Ernest Clarke, admirable so far as the singing is concerned, but poor as regards the subject. We are very glad to place this hall at your disposal for so interesting a function (Applause). I am keenly interested of course, as we all are, in anything which will promote music. It does seem to me a great compliment that the musicians of the world should in their hearts think so much of English music and of English musicians, as themselves to suggest London as the place of their Congress, and when they come it will be our pleasure and our privilege to show that their confidence in, and admiration for, English music has not been misplaced.

The meeting then terminated.

Occasional Notes.

The retirement of Dr. Hans Richter has been authoritatively announced, to the great regret of all classes of the musical community here and abroad. The great conductor is now sixty-eight years of age, and he richly deserves the repose for which he craves. We need not at present give an estimate of his life-work, for no doubt the opportunities for such a review will soon occur in connection with a valedictory function. It is sufficient to acknowledge now that his personality and achievements have been pregnant factors in the musical evolution of this country throughout the last thirty or more years. We gave a portrait of Dr. Richter and a sketch of his life in our issue for July, 1899.

Who shall decide when Mus. Docs. disagree? The question has been asked by many a perplexed student of counterpoint. The 'musts' of one authority are the 'must nots' of another, and the writer of a text-book will lay down a rule and immediately break it in an example. Some comfort will be afforded to examination candidates by the following announcement in the report of the Union of Graduates in Music: 'The question of the divergence of the views of authorities on the subject of strict counterpoint, and the consequent disadvantage under which Students and Candidates for musical degrees and diplomas thereby suffer, has engaged the serious attention of the Council. A committee has been appointed to examine the matter, and to ascertain whether it is possible to standardize certain aspects of the subject, so as to bring about a greater uniformity in the teaching and practice of strict counterpoint.'

The same subject was dealt with by Dr. H. A. Harding on January 14 at the Diploma distribution of the Royal College of Organists. He said it was time something was done in the direction of finding some common ground of agreement with regard to the rules of counterpoint. He firmly believed in the beneficial results of a course of strict counterpoint, but considered that the present diversity in interpretation of the rules of counterpoint, which was found at nearly every British college, academy, and university, was a slur upon the mental capacity of the members of our profession, and an impediment to the progress of musical students. 'Some of these so-called rules,' he said, 'are as silly as they are misleading, and I cannot help sympathizing, to some extent, with those of our candidates who gave us such perfectly ugly yet "correct" specimens of counterpoint.'

The latest musical prodigy is Master Madan Mohan Chatterjee, of Calcutta, aged five. His first appearance was made at the age of three years and two months, when he greatly surprised the guests at a soirée with his singing of Bengali songs. A newspaper notice of a subsequent performance tells that 'his voice, fine yet powerful—verging on lisping, still quite distinct word for word. His cadence was quite proportionate. In short the performance was beyond reproach and cavil, perfectly blameless, both æsthetically and scientifically.' On this occasion the father, who introduced the boy, was nervous. But 'Master Madan like a parrot—varily he is in size not very much larger than a big member of the feathery tribe—perched on a cushioned chair facing his father who played the Harmonium.' The child's gifts are further described in the following translations from Bengali papers: 'Let us say a single word that those who have heard the sweet melodious songs of a four years child our "Master Madan" his life is of no value. Our Master Madan is the spotless fullmoon of the Purnima Milan.' 'The Goddess of Music has endowed the vocal organs of this little child with the strings of the violin properly set to tune.' Quite a remarkable lad. When his fifth birthday was celebrated the father had arranged to entertain the guests 'with concrete materials—not mere sounds and sentiments.' 'The guests at their fill and blessed the boy Madan, their host at every mouthful.'

Mr. Ernst Denhof, who organized the performances of Wagner's 'Der Ring des Nibelungen' given at Edinburgh last year, has at length concluded arrangements for performances of the 'Ring' to be given at Leeds, Manchester, and Glasgow. This is a great achievement, and one which only the persuasive power of sound business methods could have accomplished. One assumes as a matter of course that the productions are well guaranteed. It is also a notable event in English musical progress. The opportunity for the venture is ripe, for provincial towns, whose conservatism seemed unassailable not many years ago, are now following closely in the wake of London in the appreciation of modern works. Wagner's great dramas will make their appeal to audiences prepared to understand the depth of beauty and meaning of their musical expression. The cast will be practically the same as at Edinburgh, and Herr Balling will again conduct. The artistic success of the undertaking is therefore assured. The cycles will commence at Leeds during the week following March 27, at Manchester on April 3, and at Glasgow on April 11.

The full programme and itinerary of the Musical Festival of the Empire organized by Dr. Charles Harriss are now completely arranged. The tour of the world to be undertaken by the Sheffield Choir of two hundred voices, under the conductorship of Dr. Coward and Dr. Harriss, will commence on March 17 at Liverpool. The party will visit over thirty cities and towns in Canada and the United States and will proceed to Hawaii, Australia, New Zealand, and South Africa, arriving back in England at the beginning of October. Well-known soloists will accompany the party and local choral organizations will assist at the concerts.

'DER ROSENKAVALIER.'

By A. KALISCH.

The first production of Strauss's and Herr von Hofmannsthal's 'Der Rosenkavalier' took place at Dresden under the conductorship of Ernst von Schuch on January 26, amid all the surroundings with which previous Strauss premières have made us familiar, only—as one is tempted to say regardless of grammar—more so. It is probably true that no larger number of musical critics has ever been assembled under one roof before, to say nothing of composers, conductors, and singers. In fact, as an eminent musician playfully remarked in one of the entr'actes, 'If a bomb were to explode here now, how the history of music would be changed!' The circumstances of such a production cannot fail to some extent to put obstacles in the way of anyone who wishes to form an unbiassed judicial opinion, and quite apart from this the work itself is one about which it is not at all easy to make up one's mind. That the score of 'Der Rosenkavalier' contains two or three scenes equal to anything that Strauss has written is almost universally admitted; in fact, two at least of the most prominent anti-Straussians in Germany openly declared themselves converted by this music. On the other hand, the opera as a whole suggests many problems. Writing some time after the performance one has naturally had an opportunity of reading a great deal which has been written about it; and it is perhaps more useful to put on record the general trend of critical opinion than to chronicle one's own individual impressions.

FEAULEIN MARGARETHE SIMS.

Before proceeding farther, it is well to bear in mind the precise description of the work on the title page, which runs: "Der Rosenkavalier" Comedy for Music by Hugo von Hofmannsthal, music by Richard Strauss. It is, then, as a comedy in the first instance that the work is to be considered. Not unnaturally in discussing it writers have drawn comparisons with the greatest works in which humour and music are combined, 'Le Nozze di Figaro,' 'Il Barbiere,' 'Die Meistersinger,' and 'Falstaff'; while those who are less respectfully inclined have, absurdly enough, not scrupled to speak of 'Merry Widows' and 'Waltz Dreams.'

The great merit of the work according to one view—the great stumbling-block in the minds of others—is its newness of form. That the composer himself was conscious of the difficulties and dangers of his experiment may be gathered from what he said to an interviewer shortly before the production: that the sovereign quality of any work was its homogeneity. It is to this aspect of the music that the writers of all countries whose opinions carry most weight have chiefly directed their attention. On the one hand, we are told that it is a great triumph, because of the essential unity to which the music attains; on the other, that the various elements have not been distilled in the alembic of the composer's personality into one homogeneous substance. The writer who in discussing Strauss refers back to what happened in the case of Wagner is always accused of fear of posterity. It is said that, knowing how ridiculous the earlier objectors to Wagner made themselves in our eyes, we are afraid lest our grandchildren may laugh at us, and that we palter with our consciences accordingly. Still I cannot refrain from recalling that when I myself was taken to a concert in Germany to hear the Prelude to 'Die Meistersinger,' the Dance of the Apprentices, and the Prelude to the third Act followed by the Preislied, I was told by my teacher, who was an ardent Wagnerian, that though each piece was singularly beautiful in itself, one could not imagine any sane form of opera which found a place for four things so different within the four corners of its score. It is not necessary to point out what would be said of anyone uttering such an opinion to-day.

There is, undoubtedly, in 'Der Rosenkavalier' a strange mixture of elements. We have Mozartian episodes, we have folk-tunes, we have music which smacks of the romanticism of fifty years ago, we have passages which might have come from 'Elektra,' we have suggestions of 'Till Eulenspiegel,' 'Don Quixote,' or 'Heldenleben,' and we have a great many Viennese waltzes; but with the exception of the passages in which the composer sets himself to re-create the atmosphere of the 18th century, he always treats his material in his own way, and in such a way that one cannot but feel that Strauss and Strauss only is the author. It is interesting to note that this question is the one which seems the most important one, not only to those who attended the Dresden première, but to those who have discussed the subsequent performances of the work in other German towns. If and when we have an opportunity of forming our own judgment in England, this will probably be our chief problem.

It may be necessary to recount the plot again, although it has been set out in so many places already. A Rosenkavalier was a messenger sent by an accepted suitor to his bride to herald his coming, and to present to her a silver rose as a token of his love. The main plot which Hofmannsthal has invented tells of the supplanting of the suitor, Baron Ochs of Lerchenau, by his Rosenkavalier, the young Count Octavian of Rofrano, in the affections of Sophia von Faninal, the daughter of a newly ennobled wealthy army contractor.

The first Act takes place in the bedroom of the Princess, where a meeting between her and Octavian is disturbed by the arrival of the Baron, who has come to ask the Princess, who is his cousin, to help him in the choice of a Rosenkavalier. Octavian hides behind a screen and emerges disguised as a maid-servant. In this guise he attracts the attention of the Baron, who suggests a meeting at a tête-à-tête supper. We see the motley crowd which attends the Princess's levee, and the Act ends with her lament and another duet between her and Octavian. In the second Act we see Herr von Faninal awaiting the arrival of the Rosenkavalier. When he comes she is attracted by him as much as she is repelled by the brutal wooing of the Baron. High words ensue between the two men, and Octavian wounds the Baron, and it is clear that Sophia and Octavian have fallen in love at first sight. Before the Act closes, the Baron receives a note from the Princess's waiting-maid (in other words, Octavian) in which she—or he—agrees to meet the Baron. In the third Act the meeting takes place, and an elaborate series of traps has been laid for the Baron by Octavian. The police interfere, and ultimately Herr von Faninal, Sophia and the Princess all appear, and the Baron's discomfiture is complete. The Princess resigns herself to the inevitable, and gracefully yields to her younger rival—indeed, persuades Herr von Faninal to consent to the union of Octavian and Sophia; and all ends happily for everybody—except the Princess, and of course the disgraced Baron.

A great deal of course turns on the likeness between the waiting-maid and Octavian, which is explained by suggesting a relationship between them. The Baron is a rustic Don Juan of a low type in spite of his high birth, of which he never ceases to speak; and the character is drawn with great skill.

The mainspring of the action is the character of the Princess. Curiously enough, however, some writers have strongly condemned the libretto on the ground that too much importance is given to the Princess, who is described as an unnecessary appendage, but the majority rightly look upon the creation of this original character as the greatest achievement of the poet. As to the exceptional literary merit of von Hofmannsthal's text, and his skill in delineating the characters of the Baron, Octavian and the Princess, all are agreed, even those who think the Princess has no place in the drama. At any rate, to the Princess falls the most important scene in the work, her soliloquy at the end of the first Act in which she laments the passing of her youth. She also takes part in the Trio at the end of the third Act with Sophia and Octavian. These two scenes are undoubtedly the gems of the work, and both made the profoundest possible impression on the audience. The music of both is of extreme lyrical beauty and powerful dramatic expressiveness, and the skill with which the Trio of female voices is worked from apparently trivial beginnings to an overpowering climax bears the mark of genius. Next in importance is the scene in which the Rosenkavalier first presents the Rose to Sophia. Strauss has seldom shown his power of tone-painting in gorgeous and delicate colours more convincingly than here, and in all these three scenes the music is in its essentials much simpler than that which we are accustomed to associate with his name. A charming little Mozartian minuet in the first love-scene between Octavian and the Princess, the duets between Octavian and Sophia, which are differentiated with wonderful nicety, and the elaborate Fugato which serves as an introduction to the third Act, and is, in spite of its complexity, a carnival of high spirits, are a few of the other things which dwell most prominently in the memory.

The performance at Dresden was remarkable even among Dresden performances for perfection of mise-en-scène and stage-management, and for the wonderful spirit and subtlety and flexibility of Herr von Schuch's conducting. Among the principals Fräulein Siems (who was the Chrysothemis of the original production of 'Elektra') chiefly distinguished herself by her beautifully finished and sympathetic portrait of the Princess. Her singing of the monologue was a great triumph. Fräulein von der Osten was excellent as Octavian, both when he appeared in proprüia personā and when he was disguised as a waiting-maid. It is a bold experiment on the part of Strauss, which will cause not a little perplexity to managers, that he has written this part for a mezzo-soprano and has distinctly said that he does not wish it to be played by those who usually undertake what are known as the Dugazon rôles. Frau Minnie Nast was delightful as Sophia, but the two great Wagnerians, Herr Perron and Herr Scheidemantel, were quite out of their element in the comic parts of the Baron and Herr von Faninal respectively. The minor parts were all admirably filled. It will be noticed that here too Strauss has not given a part of any importance to a tenor. Strauss's music-dramas have this in common with those of Wagner, that the smaller parts require just as great artistry as the more important ones; and in this case the difficulty of the extremely free declamation, which is, from a technical point of view, perhaps one of the most interesting features of the score, affects all alike.

A POINT IN CRITICISM.

BY HERBERT ANTCLIFFE.

The mistakes and rash judgments of the musical critics of past generations might form the subject of a lengthy treatise without any satisfactory explanation being given why these mistakes have been made, and in what particular respect the judgments have been rash. The lack of full knowledge, and the possession of prejudice, are generally regarded as the cause, for it is an opinion held not only by uninformed or careless thinkers, but by many of the ablest critics themselves, that it is quite as easy to appraise the true value of a contemporary work as it is to appraise that of the works of a generation or more ago. Ignorance and prejudice are, of course, just as much the cause of wrong musical criticism as they are of every other kind of wrong judgment. But there have been cases where critics of every kind have been misled; where the ignorant public and the equally ignorant journalist have agreed with the learned pedant in condemning a work, and the earnest music-lover has been disappointed in such work, which, later, has become a delight to all. It can hardly have been that all save the composer himself have been ignorant and prejudiced! There are surely not many Sodoms and Gomorrah, even in the matter of artistic righteousness.

Mr. Ernest Newman, in a recent article, has said that 'No criticism of great works of art can hope to endure unless it is founded on full knowledge of them.' True. But is it possible for the critic to have a full knowledge of contemporary works? For several reasons it would appear that it is not. Quite apart from the difficulties of seeing and hearing frequently works which living composers from time to time bring forward, there are reasons connected with the music itself, and with the circumstances surrounding it, which make the attainment of a full knowledge impossible, at any rate in the large majority of cases. First of these comes the fact that to gain a full knowledge of a work we must see it in its proper relation to whatever surrounds it. This is particularly the case with works of art. The value of a work of art depends entirely upon the effect which it has upon the minds and the lives of others. If it carries with it a great influence for good, we may class the work as a great one in some degree or respect. But to what degree it is impossible to say until we have had an opportunity of seeing whether that influence is likely to be permanent and universal or merely temporary and local. Even innate qualities cannot be recognized without a knowledge of both prior and contemporaneous works. The quality to which this most evidently applies is that of originality. Originality in both thought and expression has often been claimed for a work which, later, is discovered to contain only a large measure of bizarrerie, or to be constructed in the same manner and of the same substance and material as all its greater and less contemporaries. Time must be taken to discover in what respect and to what degree a work differs from those which come into being at the same period and in the same circumstances. A full knowledge of all, even of the greatest, contemporary work is impossible, owing to the necessary limitations which surround both the works themselves and the persons concerned in their creation, production, and criticism. The acquisition of a knowledge of such works is easier to-day than ever before, thanks to the development of the printing-press and of facilities for travelling, but full and complete knowledge of many of the finest modern works is still not available, nor will it ever be. There will always be some men, and they usually among the most amply gifted and inspired, who from lack of opportunity or from a sense of modesty, withhold their works from the world. And without these works we make our necessary comparisons in the dark. Both we ourselves and our works are so much the creatures of circumstances that we cannot see those circumstances, for we cannot get away from them; and without an independent view and consequent knowledge of such circumstances we cannot know either ourselves or others as fully as we should.

Further, there is the fact of the development of the music itself. The present writer is being increasingly convinced that there is, not only in the art of music, but in every specimen of that art, a growth or development and a decline with age, mysterious and unobservable (as all growth and decay is), but none the less real. Some years ago the late Vernon Blackburn drew attention to the internal decay which even popular and classical music suffers by reason of its age, and his idea has been well substantiated and commonly accepted. Works which less than a generation ago were regarded by the soundest critics as immortal are now seen to be losing their power to please as well as to edify. They are suffering the decrepitude of old age. If, then, each musical work that is created partakes of the same nature as humanity to the extent of being mortal, why should it not partake of its nature in also having an infancy, a youth, and a full maturity before the time of decay arrives? The idea may be one that is not readily realized, yet the fact of the slow appreciation of the strongest and greatest creations of the art makes it appear a highly probable one. And assuming it to be a correct one, it is surely a further cause of the difficulty of appraising the value of contemporary works, for, unless their life is to be rapid and short, they do not in the lifetime of their composers attain their full maturity. The age at which they do this varies with each individual work, but it is not sufficiently early to make a contemporary valuation an exact one.

Last comes the question of education. By education is meant the assimilation of knowledge imparted by others. The mere repetition of another person's opinion is, of course, not criticism any more than the mere repetition of a lesson is education, and the critic who merely follows blindly the leading of greater minds than his own is unworthy of the name. The confirmation or controversion of an already expressed opinion is, however, a simpler matter than the formation of an opinion without any previous knowledge even at second hand, and is a useful and quite legitimate method of valuing art work. It is a comparatively easy matter to see for ourselves the relative greatness of each of the classics, because we have the assistance of an education based on these works. Most people are brought up more or less on a knowledge of some simple classical works, but to the majority the knowledge which comes in later life of the greatest of them is imparted first by a tradition of their greatness, then by descriptions of their qualities, and last of all by personal acquaintance with and personal judgment of those qualities. Yet because of this process our judgment of the value of the classics need be no less individual. Our education enables us to form an opinion more readily and certainly even when we have the temerity to differ from our teachers and elders.

But even more than this is the fact that we are more fully acquainted with the idiom of the composers of classic days than with that of the composers who are still living and working. The reason for this is evident. The idiom of the classics is fixed, that of the works of living writers is changing every day, and each one—in a greater or less degree—forms his own, so that we do not find any one style of expression to serve as a criterion. The number of works belonging to the past which have survived to our own day is limited, and the process of limitation has involved the selection (unconscious and undeliberate, of course) of those works only which are expressed in the idiom understandable by all. As it is easier to appraise the value of a classical work than it is to determine that of a newly discovered work of the same period, so it is a simpler matter to judge of the latter than of the value of a quite new one. Mendelssohn was able to say at once and with certainty that the works of Bach which he discovered were those of a genius better than he was able to discriminate the comparative values of the works of Macfarren and Schumann. And the reason was that Bach's works were fully matured and expressed in a classical idiom, while those of the composers who were Mendelssohn's contemporaries were still in their infancy and were expressed in an idiom at that time still undeveloped.

KÖCHEL.

By JEFFREY PULVER.

How many people read the name of a work of Mozart's, followed by the name Köchel and a number in brackets, and think of the debt owed to the bearer of that name by all lovers of music in general, and by the followers of Mozart in particular? Very few, it will be confessed; and yet Ludwig Chevalier von Köchel devoted, wholeheartedly, a large portion of his busy life to the gathering together and to the classification of all the authenticated and doubtful works of the great master, under the title of 'Chronologisch-Thematisches Verzeichniss sämmtlicher Tonwerke W. A. Mozarts'—a title usually abbreviated into the familiar bracketed word (Köchel).

But it is not so much to this unequalled catalogue that I wish, particularly, to draw attention as to the man himself, and such of his works as are of interest to musicians.

The authority most qualified to speak of Köchel, and the most worthy of being quoted, is Paul Count Waldersee, originally a Prussian officer, born at Potsdam in 1831, who, retiring from the army in 1871, devoted himself to the study of music and the editing of musical works; the most important of these being the second edition of the Köchel Mozart-Catalogue, from the preface of which we obtain a very complete account of Köchel's life.

Ludwig Alois Friedrich Köchel was born at Stein, on the Danube, in Lower Austria, on January 14, 1800. His father was Johann Georg Köchel, Revenue Superintendent of Passau, and his mother Aloisia, née Steiner.

Not for long, however, was he to enjoy the pleasure of his parents' society, or that of his two brothers and sister; for all of them died while he was comparatively young, and the natural consequence was that he led a lonely and joyless youth. One consolation was that his father had ensured for his son a many-sided and thorough education; and the official position held by Köchel père secured for Ludwig a ready admission into high circles. The foundations of his education were laid in the schoolroom of his native Stein; and these were strengthened by courses in the Gymnasium of Krems. The High-School of Vienna finally claimed him, and it was there that he pursued his study of jurisprudence, and obtained his Doctorate in Laws. His first appointment was that of tutor to the establishment of Count P. von Grünne, Lord High Steward to the Archduke Charles. It was not long after this that he entered the service of the Archduke Carl himself, as tutor to the latter's sons, the Archdukes Albrecht, Carl Ferdinand, Friedrich, and Wilhelm, a post he retained from 1827 until 1842, concurrently with his inseparable friend and colleague, Franz von Scharschmid, Doctor of Laws; Köchel's devoted friendship was terminated only by his death.

Köchel visited England on the occasion of his tour in the frigate 'Bellona,' when he accompanied the Archduke Friedrich. During the course of this voyage, the royal pupil and his distinguished master visited Algeria, Portugal, Scotland, and England, meeting famous men everywhere, and profiting by contact with them; while many notable acquaintances were made when Friedrich and Köchel visited the Court at Windsor Castle.

Köchel's untiring energy and sterling qualities were, happily, not allowed to rest unappreciated and unhonoured; for in 1832, when at the comparatively early age of thirty-two, he was elected Imperial Councillor, and in 1842 he received the Cross of the Leopold order of Knighthood. The following year he withdrew into private life, and settled in Vienna; but not for long; for his fidus Achates, Franz von Scharschmid, having obtained in 1848 the post of President of the Assizes at Teschen, attracted him thither also.

Thenceforth the two friends were never separated for any appreciable length of time; when Scharschmid was called to Salzburg in the same capacity as he had been to Teschen, Köchel accompanied him, and it was doubtless his presence at the birthplace of the immortal Mozart that stimulated his desire to classify, thematically and chronologically, the works of the master. While there, Köchel received in 1850 the position and style of 'Imperial and Royal Councillor for Education,' which he held for only two years, his free-thinking and liberal broad-mindedness not harmonizing with the trend of thought of those in authority at the time.

Köchel was now at liberty to devote himself entirely to his various studies; not only musical, but also botanical and mineralogical. The various voyages he made to acquire knowledge of these two exacting sciences, and for the works he published on them, do not come within the province of this sketch. The year 1863 found both Köchel and Scharschmid in Vienna again. There he lived until June 3, 1877, when he died at the residence of his quondam pupil, now Field-Marshal and Grand Duke Albrecht, who had allowed Köchel a dwelling in his Vienna palace for life.

Such, then, are the main facts connected with the life of a man whose works are so important to the musical bibliographer.

The first of Köchel's writings of which I can find any record is the 'Musik am Oestreichischen Hof' ('Music at the Austrian Court'), cited by Waldersee, and published at Vienna in 1856.

Köchel's next work was 'Über den Umfang der musikalischen Produktionen Wolfgang Amadé Mozarts' ('On the extent of the musical productivity of W. A. Mozart'), published in 1862 and considered by Riemann to have been the forerunner of the famous Catalogue, 'Chronological and thematic catalogue of all Mozart's musical works' (the German title of which has already been quoted above), published at Leipzig by Breitkopf & Härtel in 1862. In 1864 Köchel contributed to the 'Allgemeine Musik-Zeitung' some additions to his list. The preparation of this colossal work—which, says Fétis, occupied twenty years of its author's life—necessitated prolonged sojourns in London, Paris, and Berlin; and not only did he give his years so lavishly to this task, but he also contributed materially from his own funds towards the realization of his hopes.

The basis of the work was supplied by a catalogue started by Mozart himself, and kept up-to-date by him until shortly before his early death. This manuscript, which is entitled 'Verzeichnüss (sic) aller meiner Werke, vom Monath Februario, 1784, his Monath—' ('Catalogue of all my works, from the month of February, 1784, until the month —'), was, at that time, in the possession of Mr. C. A. André, of Frankfort-on-the-Main, whose father, the Court-councillor A. André, earned the gratitude of all musicians by publishing two editions of it, in 1805 and 1828. The manuscript contains fourteen blank pages, and Köchel's work would evidently have been considerably augmented had Mozart but lived a life of even average length. With what reverential care and thoroughness does Köchel treat his subject! With what enthusiasm does he eulogize Otto Jahn (to whom the work is dedicated) for having given to the world the 'Life of Mozart'! In the ten pages of his preface he shows how great was the earnestness with which he lived with this subject until it was completed to his entire satisfaction. This preface is followed by the entire Mozartiana, interspersed with many instructive annotations. The whole is but an instance, as Fétis writes, 'of what an ingenious and intelligent mind can draw from an apparently dry and uninteresting subject.'

In 1865 was published, in pamphlet form, '83 neu-entdeckte original Briefe Ludwig van Beethovens an den Erzherzog Rudolf, Cardinal-Erzbischof von Olmütz,' ('83 newly-discovered original letters of L. v. Beethoven to the Archduke Rudolf, Cardinal-Archbishop of Olmütz'), which Köchel edited and annotated, mentioning the historical connections suggested by the epistles, in his own inimitably systematic fashion. These letters were discovered in 1864, at the death of the Archduke Ludwig Joseph, who had inherited them from his brother Rudolf. At his death the Beethoven letters passed into Archduke Leopold's keeping; and the happy result was that Dr. Kaspar von Seiller and Dr. Leopold von Sonnleithner were permitted to publish them. These letters are very interesting reading, and, although their substance does not fall within the scope of this article, it may, however, be mentioned in passing that they show how friendly were the relations between Beethoven and the Archduke Rudolf; a fact still more emphasized by the number of important works that Beethoven dedicated to this clerical Prince, and which are enumerated by Köchel in his notes. Four years elapsed before Köchel published his next work of musical interest in 1869. This was the 'Kaiserliche Hof-Musikkapelle zu Wien von 1543 bis 1867' ('The Imperial Court-Orchestra of Vienna from 1543 to 1867'), a history of the music at the Austrian Court during the three centuries that count most in the history of Music.

In the preparation of this work, Köchel was doubtlessly aided by the easy access he must have had to the various documents and accounts in the royal archives, bearing upon the subject and the period under consideration. After dealing historically with his subject, the author adds one of his characteristic appendices giving a complete list of the musicians employed at Court during each of the epochs into which the book is divided; adding particulars of the duration of each man's service, and in many cases even their salaries. The year 1872 saw the publication of Köchel's historico-biographical work, 'Johann Joseph Fux; Hof-Compositor und Hof-Kapellmeister der Kaiser Leopold I., Joseph I., und Karl VI., von 1698 bis 1740, nach urkundlichen Forschungen' ('J. J. Fux; Court Composer and Conductor to the Emperors Leopold I., Joseph I., and Karl VI., from 1698 until 1740, based upon documentary research'). In this work Köchel has shown a most minute thoroughness, and acknowledges the assistance afforded him by the Imperial Academy of Science in Vienna. After biographical matter running into 580 pages, Köchel once more mounts his pet hobby and gives a 'thematic catalogue of the works of J. J. Fux.' Besides giving us these works, Köchel was one of the prime promoters of the beautiful edition of Mozart's compositions, published by Breitkopf & Härtel, and to this labour devoted not only infinite pains, but also a considerable portion of his fortune.

In 1905 this house published, at Leipsic, the second edition of the great Mozart-Catalogue, edited by Paul Count von Waldersee. This edition is (except for the additions made by Köchel himself after publication of the first edition and some few made by the editor), almost identical, in subject-matter, with the first. It is in the preface, and in the biographical sketch of Köchel's life from the pen of Count Waldersee, that the interest of this second edition lies; and I am indebted to these for much information. A portrait of Köchel and a facsimile of his autograph have also been added, these having been supplied by a volume of original poems published by Köchel in 1872.

In reviewing the life and work of Ludwig Chevalier von Köchel, it is easy to perceive the forces that impelled him to give expression to his inborn desire for system; his studies of jurisprudence and pedagogy added to his inveterate love for botany and mineralogy (both of them sciences which require strict regard for order), all helped to create the longing to see everything reduced to classified tables. Seeing how much of his life was devoted to the work of the Master of Salzburg, it was a fitting tribute to his memory that the Mozart 'Requiem' was performed at his funeral.

Church and Organ Music.

THE ORGAN, AND ITS RANGE OF EXPRESSION.

The organ has for so long been associated with the solemn traditions of the Church, to which it owes its birth, that its use as an instrument suitable for elaborate solo performance has thereby been greatly influenced. These traditions have also affected the work of organ composers, and the attitude of those who listen to organ performances, with the result that many have turned away from the instrument, with the conviction that it is cold and wanting in expression.

Music may be divided into two classes, viz., the intellectual and that which may be termed the sensual. The intellect can only recognize and accept music which has the highest ideals, as is the case in painting and literature and kindred arts, while the sensual side of human nature demands that which is easily assimilated and of more obvious appeal to the unthinking.

There is a vast difference between the sensual and the emotional, and to widely educated minds the organ in proper hands is capable of making a strong emotional appeal. But we claim that the instrument has a vast future before it in the realms of expression. It has developed during recent years from a mere collection of pipes, roughly grouped, until it promises to become really a 'musical instrument.' The splendid instruments built during the last thirty years give colour to this contention, and it may be truly said that much of our late organ music would have been unplayable on the majority of organs in existence in the middle of the last century. In support of this statement it is only necessary to mention the great improvement in the means of stop-control and the application of the pneumatic principle to key- and drawstop-action, which gave an enormous impetus to technique and rapidity of stop-changing. The adoption of vertical swell shutters, with the attendant advantage of a swell pedal obedient to the least pressure of the foot in either direction, added very greatly to one of the chief means of expression. The all-important questions of voicing and regulating, which were such a feature of Father Willis's work, are now generally receiving the attention they deserve, much of this being due to the intelligent interest in these matters taken by the younger generation of organists.

The development of the tonal possibilities goes hand-in-hand with the new school of organ composers, of which representatives are to be found in many countries besides our own. But there exists in many quarters a deep-rooted prejudice against the organ, which we believe to be entirely due to the want of study of the genius of the instrument by those who play upon it. Why do we hear so much organ-playing that is bad, from lack of either knowledge or care in stop-changing, and the all-important details of phrasing, true legato, and the use of the swell pedal?

These are the subtle points of which the proper observance is a necessity if the organist is to be considered an artist as well. It has been said by one of our most eminent players that a good organist may be known, if by nothing else, by his use of the swell pedal.

One of the greatest mistakes lies in the attempt actually to imitate the orchestra when playing orchestral arrangements, and we look to the composers and the organ-builders of the future to give us organ-music and organs which will make the transcription unnecessary. Indeed, we are bold enough to ask why the sounds given by orchestral instruments should be taken as the standard for our organ stops. We can point to the Diapason family as our own private property, and there are many varieties of tone which cannot and need not be compared with orchestral instruments. After all, these are the invention of man, and we see no reason why even they should remain for ever. The organ may surely become an instrument containing the means of producing sounds peculiar to itself. The subject is an interesting one, about which there is much more to be said.

In a paper read at a recent I.S.M. meeting, Dr. H. W. Richards gave excellent advice which might be followed, not only by students, but by many who with insufficient thought take up the important duties of an organist. In speaking of the older school of services and anthems, he pointed out that a knowledge of harmony was a sine qua non, and that so much had been done in these latter days for the organist that he has now simply to follow the accompaniment provided. This is of course quite true, and only strengthens our opinion, which is that every organist ought to go through a course of training in that old school before settling down to modern methods. He will be a better musician for the experience. The lecturer made many good points in his remarks on the Introduction of the anthem, rightly insisting on its being part of the anthem, instead of an 'aimless meandering.' He illustrated his remarks in two different ways, viz., how to do it, and how not to do it, the latter affording some amusement. Much was said as to the art of extemporizing, and its importance was insisted on. The intricacies of organ management in its use as a means of accompaniment was dwelt upon at some length, and much excellent advice given, concerning choice of stops and their suitability, while the important subject of phrasing in its relation to the art of accompanying received due attention.

Altogether, Dr. Richards said very much that must have been most helpful to his appreciative audience.

AUCKLAND, N.Z., TOWN HALL ORGAN.

The organ (the gift of H. Butt, Esq., Auckland) will be placed in a chamber at the back of the orchestra, and will present a very handsome appearance, the large front pipes measuring over 36 ft. from the top of the pipe to the bottom of the pipe foot. The organ case has been designed by Messrs. J. J. & J. Clark, of Melbourne—the architects of the Hall—and will be carried out in oak by Messrs. Norman & Beard, Ltd.

The organ will consist of four manuals, from CC to C (61 notes), and 2½ octaves of pedals from CCC to G (32 notes), and will contain 59 speaking stops and 16 couplers, &c., making a total of 75 drawstops. The following is a summary of the contents of the organ:

3 stops 32 ft. tone .. ..	96 pipes.
12 " 16 " " " .. ..	478 "
29 " 8 " " " .. ..	1,622 "
9 " 4 " " " .. ..	549 "
3 " 2 " " " .. ..	183 "
3 " Various .. ..	427 "
59 speaking stops.	3,355 total pipes.
16 couplers, &c.
75 drawstops.

The Wellington Town Hall organ contains 58 speaking stops and 3,213 pipes. The Auckland Organ therefore will be the largest in the Dominion.

The console is being made to Mr. Lemare's design, and will be in advance of anything yet attempted in this country. The pedal-board is absolutely of the Willis scale and is of full length, so as to give good leverage and enable the player to pass one foot behind the other and depress the pedals with the hindmost foot when necessary. The pedal-board is also placed well under the keys (11 ins. from front of the Choir organ keys) to allow of a good heel and ankle movement.

Composition pedals have been replaced by pedal pistons. These radiate with the pedals and are of brass—projecting from a levelled panel and within easy reach of the player. The slightest touch with the toe of the foot is sufficient to operate the stop-knobs, and they also have the advantage of being easily seen.

The Pedal organ stops will have independent control—by the pedal pistons—or if preferred they can be coupled to the Great organ thumb pistons.

The octave couplers on each manual will work when coupled to any other manual or pedal, and 'unison offs' are placed in the swell and Choir key-frame in the form of tilting tablets.

The stop knobs are of solid ivory, working in ivory bushes, and will present a very handsome appearance. The Swell, Choir, and couplers will be grouped on the left of the player, and the Great, Solo and Pedal on the right according to Mr. Lemare's design.

The action of the organ will be tubular-pneumatic throughout, of similar type to that adopted by the builders in their organs in the Royal College of Organists and Guildhall School of Music, London, and will give instant response whether the manuals are used singly or coupled.

The wind will be produced by rotary blowers operated by electric motors, which will supply wind to reservoirs placed in various positions in the organ.

The wind-pressures will be as follows:

Great organ	..	Flue work, 4 in.;	Reeds and large open Diapason, 8 in.
Swell	..	Flue work, Oboe and Vox humana, 4 in.;	Reeds and diaphonic Diapason, 8 in.
Choir	..	4 in. throughout.
Solo	..	8 in. and 15 in.
Pedal	..	Flue work, 4 in. and 6 in.;	Reeds, 12 in.

The pitch of the organ will be French normal, 522 vibrations per second at 60 degrees Fahr. Three different forms of undulating stops are to be provided, viz., two ranks of undulating flute stops (Unda Maris) and three ranks of orchestral string-toned stops being placed on the Choir, and two ranks of Dulciana quality on the Swell.

The idea of the pedal-pistons is not new, Father Willis having years ago applied the principle to the organ in Wells Cathedral. We remember several 'mushrooms' standing over the pedal-board, in much the same position as those described above. They were removed by Messrs. Willis several years ago, when the console was put on the south side. After some experience, they should prove lighter and more convenient than the usual composition pedals.

We have received from Mr. H. A. Wheeldon, organist of the Metropolitan Church, Toronto, an account of the reopening of the organ after its rebuilding and enlargement by the Kamm Morris Co., Woodstock (Ont.). Mr. Wheeldon also mentions Messrs. C. S. & Frank Warren in connection with much excellent work in the instrument. The reopening took place on January 16, when a most interesting programme, in which many styles were represented, was given by Mr. Wheeldon, while Mrs. Will Merry and Mr. Frank E. Bemrose contributed some vocal solos. Mr. Wheeldon speaks of the organ as the best in Canada and equal to the best in England.

On Sunday, February 19, the St. John's College (Cambridge) Musical Society gave in the College Chapel an interesting selection from the works of J. S. Bach. Included in the scheme were the motet 'Sing ye to the Lord,' the cantata 'A stronghold sure,' and the concerto in E major for solo violin, string orchestra and organ. Mr. W. L. Raynes was at the organ and gave two of the Choral Preludes by way of introduction, while Mr. Haydn Inwards was the solo violinist. The solos in the cantata were taken by the Chapel chorists, and by Messrs. Dunn, Thompson, Sharpe and Hunt. Dr. Cyril Rootham, organist of the College, conducted most ably.

The Bach Choir made a departure from their usual custom on February 17 when they sang Bach's 'St. Matthew' Passion at Westminster Abbey, where it had not been heard for several years. Under Dr. H. P. Allen's enlightened direction the choir sang with musical insight and reverent feeling. The tenor solo music was sung by Mr. Gervase Elwes with his usual distinction; the other soloists were Miss Rhoda von Glehn, Miss Dilyss Jones, Mr. Campbell McInnes and Mr. Bertram Mills. The accompaniments were supplied by an orchestra, by Dr. W. H. Harris at the pianoforte, by Sir Frederick Bridge and Dr. W. G. Alcock at the organ.

Reviews.

Old English Instruments of Music; their history and character. By Francis W. Galpin, M.A., F.L.S.

[Methuen & Co.]

The merest glance at this work is sufficient to show that it is one for which the average musician, and others interested in the literature of music, have long been looking.

The fact that Mr. Galpin, one of the highest authorities in this subject, has been induced to undertake the work completes our gratification, and at once removes any doubt as to its being a mere paste-and-scissors compilation. The illustrations, of which it is full, are most valuable, for they are not stale reproductions from examples already existing in print, but are from actual instruments in Mr. Galpin's own and other famous collections.

The author has cleared up a great deal of the mystery which, by reason of careless nomenclature, has hung over this subject. The older writers, where they have mentioned musical instruments, have greatly confused the matter by calling different instruments by the same name, and even writers of to-day have not been guiltless of similar errors—as for example, when a piano-organ is called a 'hurdy-gurdy,' or a guitar defined (as it is in a recently published dictionary) as 'resembling a violin, but larger, and having six strings.'

Quoting early records, Mr. Galpin fixes upon the cruit (crot, or rote) as the earliest instrument in use in the British Isles of which we have definite knowledge. At Berlin there exists the remnants of one, of extreme antiquity, sufficiently perfect to enable a modern model to be reconstructed, by which we see that it is an evolution of the lyre, and is identical with many pictorial and sculptured representations of a date contemporary with the period of its use.

And in this matter Mr. Galpin scores a point. On a certain stone cross, of the eighth century, at Ullard, in Ireland, there is a famous carving of a figure playing what Bunting in his Ancient Music of Ireland, 1840, asserts is a harp, and the earliest representation of the instrument in Ireland. Moreover, it is that of a harp lacking the forepillar. Bunting, upon this, evolves the pretty theory that the harp of his country has descended from the harp-like instruments of Egypt, these being a curved string-support, fixed to a hollow sounding-chamber.

Mr. Galpin's personal inspection and his photograph from the actual stone monument are sufficient to prove that the so-called harp is merely a cruit. Bunting's woodcut and Mr. Galpin's photograph may be, with advantage, compared in view of the fact that the former's wild theory is, in some quarters, religiously upheld.

Of the harp proper Mr. Galpin has much to say. One thing is that he 'fears it came from England, not that the English necessarily invented it; more probably they possessed it in common with the great Scandinavian tribes of Northern Europe.' He further asserts that the harp was adopted in Ireland 'early in the 11th century.'

The gittern and the guitar family have a full chapter, and it is interesting to note that the mysterious instrument said to have been given by Queen Elizabeth to the Earl of Leicester, which Hawkins, Burney, and even Carl Engel call 'a violin,' is proved by Mr. Galpin to be a gittern of the early 14th century. It is now at Warwick Castle, and it closely resembles in form one figured in a 14th-century MS., reproduced in the book before us.

It is needless to say that between these early examples and the gitterns and cithrens of the 17th century little similarity exists.

The space devoted to the lute, in its infinite variety, is not very large, but what is said is eminently interesting, and there are some very charming examples photographed.

After an account of the psaltery and the dulcimer, Mr. Galpin tells us much that is new regarding the crowd, the rebec, and the viol, leading the way towards the violin, and incidentally to the trumpet marine, of which he gives a plate. In this we have an excellent portrait of the author, if we are not letting out a secret.

It is common knowledge that the violin had, in England, to fight its way into favour. As late as the middle of the 17th century it was regarded as an instrument only suited to itinerant performers at country revels and tavern doors. It was more esteemed on the Continent, and this may have been from the superior workmanship of the Italian and French makers. After the Restoration, English makers and performers increased in skill, and we all know its later development.

Clavichords, virginals, spinets, and harpsichords are instruments about which much has been written, and Mr. Galpin, not to traverse old ground, is somewhat brief in his account of them.

In regard to the flute, recorder, and other woodwind instruments he writes more fully. It is a curious fact that the so-called German flute is of far greater antiquity than is generally supposed. It is here traced to India and China, where it has been in use from far-back ages. Nor does its introduction into England date merely from the Hanoverian succession, although its great use on the Continent during the early 18th century caused it to be brought more prominently into notice by the flock of German musicians who followed in the wake of Handel.

The recorder, or English flute-à-bec, was mainly in evidence up to about 1730.

The shawm, the pipe, the horn family, and organs are among the subjects treated, and the author has a great deal that is new to say about each.

We have not the space to go more fully into the text of Mr. Galpin's work. It stands as a monument of patient research, undisfigured by speculations that are not fully borne out by facts, and it will undoubtedly become the text-book of this subject.

An appendix, containing a great deal of useful matter, and a full index (for which all thanks be given) finish the book.

So far praise; one little grumble may follow. Why are not the plates numbered? It is all very well in the text to refer to, say, Plate xxvii., but how is one to identify that or any other plate?

In the Desert and in the Garden. A Lenten Cantata. By Ferris Tozer.

Via Dolorosa. A Devotion. By E. Cuthbert Nunn. [Novello & Co., Ltd.]

Sir John Stainer, in his 'Crucifixion,' enabled ordinary church choirs to give, in concise and reverent form, a musically descriptive account of the solemn events which are recalled at this season of the Church's year. His work, no doubt suggested by Bach's mighty 'Passion Music,' set a fashion which has been frequently imitated, and the cantatas named above are attempts to follow an excellent example, and to provide a devotional exercise limited as to time and difficulty. There are many good points in Dr. Tozer's work, not the least being the inclusion of two well-known hymns to be sung by the congregation. The words are written and selected by Violet Craigie Halkett, who has accomplished the task with much success.

In his 'Devotion,' Mr. Cuthbert Nunn makes some demands upon the skill of the members of the choir, by reason of unusual progressions. His music has, however, many attractions, and his earnestness of purpose is evident. We mention No. 6 as one of the more satisfactory numbers of a somewhat unequal work. The canon, too, though a little forced, is ingenious, and introduced effectively. With one reservation, viz., the constant repetition of the word 'Consider' by the Narrator, we think the libretto excellent.

Soirée Japonaise. Op. 67, No. 4. Bergeronnette Op. 71, No. 3. By Cyril Scott.

[Elkin & Co.]

Mr. Cyril Scott shows again, in the works named above, his power of making much out of little. His thematic material is slight, but the pieces flow smoothly and with constant interest on no other basis.

Marche Héroïque. For the organ. Composed by E. H. Lemare.

Prelude and Angel's farewell ('Gerontius'). Composed by Edward Elgar, and arranged for the organ by A. Herbert Brewer.

Voluntary in D minor. For the organ. Composed by William Walond; edited for the modern organ by John E. West. ('Old English Organ Music,' No. 36.) [Novello & Co., Ltd.]

Mr. Lemare's March is an excellent example of recital music, and abounds in effective rhythmical devices. While it makes no special calls upon the performer's technique, it demands some readiness in stop-changing and organ-management. The piece seems to us to possess more strength than is usually found in the composer's works, and we should welcome further similar examples from his ready and prolific pen.

Sir Edward Elgar's beautiful music has received reverent treatment at the hands of Dr. Brewer, who has succeeded in presenting the numbers in the garb of what might almost have been original organ music, so well does the instrument interpret the mystic phrases. The skilful arrangement is certain of wide acceptance.

Walond's organ piece is worth preserving, and Mr. West's edition is a praiseworthy attempt to present it in a form suitable to a modern instrument. The work consists of an Introduction and a movement of a fugal nature, in which many devices of more or less interest are employed, and the result, when given upon an organ of adequate tonal resources, should be sufficient to ensure a measure of popularity. We welcome organ music set in this strenuous style, the more so in view of the prevalence of much that verges, to say the least, on the sentimental.

The organ accompaniment of the Church Services. By H. W. Richards.

[London: Joseph Williams.]

During a long experience of church music, we have from time to time made mental notes of things which to our mind should be included in such a book as that under review. Dr. Richards has evidently employed his powers of observation in much the same manner, but with the satisfactory result of their appearance in the shape of a compiled work.

The subject has been carefully considered. After a well-written preface and introductory chapter, the necessary equipment of the organist as a 'player' is made the medium of much excellent advice; and if thoroughly grasped, this section should do much to correct what we must call thoughtlessness on the part of many an organist.

As to accompaniment, much space is of course covered, and anyone aspiring to become a church organist would do well to 'read, mark and learn' the many points so well explained. Hymns, chants, services, anthems and the Communion Service are thoroughly discussed, while examples of what not to do will be of at least equal value. The accompaniment of responses, extempore introduction to the anthem, and improvised voluntaries are considered, as well as the minor details of the organist's work in accompanying, while valuable advice is given in the art of transcribing at sight the pianoforte edition of oratorios and similar works, as well as the use of the organ with the orchestra.

We congratulate Dr. Richards in having so successfully compressed the results of his wide experience into so readable and practical a volume, which is with every fitness dedicated to Sir George Martin. There is a misprint at the end of the second example on page 47, which of course would be readily seen, otherwise the book is singularly correct.

Young Love. Composed by Granville Bantock. [Novello & Co., Ltd.]

'Young Love' is an artistic setting of words written by William Blake. The accompaniment is often a prominent and beautiful feature, and, although at first simply rhythmic and chordal, increases gradually in variety and interest. The vocal parts are well within ordinary compass, the highest treble note being F sharp and the lowest alto note B. Sometimes the vocal writing displays the composer's tendency to write rather difficult arpeggios with a syllable to each note, but as a rule the music is easy.

Reverie and Scherzo for the Organ. Composed by Gaston M. Dethier.

[J. Fischer & Bro., New York,]
[Breitkopf & Härtel, London.]

Though unpretentious, the Reverie should prove effective as a quiet and delicate contrast to some stronger piece. The harmonies and general style, if somewhat conventional, possess some interest, and the piece would show off the flutes and other soft stops to advantage.

The Scherzo is laid out on broader lines, and would tax the powers of many organists, by reason of the rapid alternation of manuals and the necessarily quick stop-changes. For a recital in a secular building it should be successful in exhibiting the capabilities of the instrument and the technique of the performer. Altogether, it is worthy of a place in the repertoire of those desiring a 'concert' piece.

Behold, O God, our Defender. Let my prayer be set forth. I am not worthy, Holy Lord. Anthems. Composed by Charles Macpherson.

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

The first two of these anthems are models of simplicity and appropriateness, and, with the high musicianship which is always evident in Mr. Macpherson's work, they should find a wide acceptance. The first is intended as an Introit, and the second for the Offertory, and each should fulfil its purpose admirably.

The third example is set for boys' voices (in three parts), and is included in Novello's 'Chorister Series of Church Music.' It would be acceptable in any case as an Introit, or for general use.

Correspondence.

ROYALTY AGREEMENTS.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

SIR,—The article in your issue of February 1, on Royalty Agreements and the Society of British Composers, raises a question of such importance to composers that I am taking the liberty of making these few remarks in answer.

I agree with the writer of the article that the question can hardly be settled by a Bill. 'It is not so much a matter of copyright as a matter of contract': but I cannot agree with his censorship of the Bill as laid before Lord Gorell's Committee. Although the substance of it may have been a matter of opinion, there was no fault to be found with the draftsmanship.

Your correspondent asks several pertinent questions at the end of his article. From these questions it is evident that he has not followed the action that the Society of Authors has taken with a view to assisting those composers who are members of the Society to obtain a fair reward for their labours and a just control of their property.

His first question is as follows:

'If the composer retains his copyright, who will be entitled to sue for infringements of the right. Can a licensee sue or take criminal proceedings while the composer retains the copyright?'

This question is practically answered by Clause 12 of the draft agreement which was settled by the Copyright Sub-Committee of the Society of Authors at the beginning of last year, which runs as follows:

'If either party has reasonable cause for believing that the copyright in the said composition has been infringed, he or they shall give immediate notice to the other party. If the composer takes proceedings in respect of the infringement and if the publishers desire to be joined in the action, they may give written notice to the composer to that effect, and on an undertaking on their part to pay an equal share in the entire costs of the litigation the composer shall join them as parties. In such case the composer shall diligently prosecute the action, but shall retain control of the proceedings, and may make any reasonable settlement with the defendants in the interests of composer and publisher, and the damages, if any, recovered shall be firstly applied in payment of costs, and if there is any surplus shall be divided equally between composer and publisher. If the composer, after the infringement has come to his notice, refuses or neglects to take proceedings in respect thereof, the publishers shall be entitled to take proceedings, and on giving the composer a sufficient and reasonable indemnity against liability for costs, shall be entitled to use the composer's name as a party to such proceedings and may make any reasonable settlement in the interest of composer and publisher, and the damages, if any, recovered shall be firstly applied in payment of costs, and if there is any surplus shall be divided in the proportion of one-third to the composer and two-thirds to the publishers.'

This Clause will also answer Question 2, which runs as follows:

'If not, will the composer undertake to sue when called upon by the licensee to do so. And if he will not give that undertaking, how is the licensee to protect himself against infringements, and pirates?'

In answer to Question 3, which runs as follows:

'If the composer does give the undertaking and afterwards assigns his royalties, will the liability on that undertaking bind the assignee of the royalties? If not, how is the licensee to protect himself against infringements, and pirates?'

the personality of an agreement of this kind is personal to the publisher, but it is not personal to this composer in the same sense, for if the agreement deal with work which has already been done by the composer it would then become equally binding upon his personal representatives.

Question 4 is also answered by Clause 12, already quoted. For the sake of clearness, it may be as well to quote the question:

'Who is to bear the costs of any legal proceedings for the protection of a copyright, having regard to the fact that at any moment for various reasons a licence may come to an end?'

Question 5 is as follows:

'Would the conversion of the business of a firm of publishers into a limited company, or the amalgamation of two or more firms into one partnership or company, with a view to improving the financial position of all of them, be such an assignment as would involve the cancellation of all the licences held by all of them?'

The answer to this must depend upon the exact wording of any contract, but it seems to me quite clear that no composer would be fool enough to take his work away if a change in the partnership was likely to be of benefit to the parties concerned. To advise those publishers who read the Musical Times how to protect themselves legally on a point of this kind, is not the province of this letter; surely they are fully aware from their constant business practice how to protect themselves. It is easy to suggest a clause to cover such a remote contingency.

It is not my intention to answer Question 6, which runs as follows:

'If the object of the composers is merely to protect their royalties as against fraudulent or impecunious assignees, what will they do with the capital value of the publication, which will revert to them as an "unearned increment" whenever a licence for any reason comes to an end?'

The question is not practical, nor do we agree with the statement that the increment is unearned. The composer has a right to sell the profits that spring from the publication of his work, except those which, perhaps, for business reasons, he may choose to pay to others. There is no unearned increment.

The 7th question refers to a business in which there is only one member. This is a rare occurrence nowadays, and it seems hardly necessary to deal with it. It is a great mistake, in dealing with general issues, to answer a question dealing with a particular limitation.

It is a satisfaction to see that a paper like the Musical Times is dealing seriously with the matter of agreement, even though, perhaps, the contributor fails to grasp its full importance to composers.

Unfortunately, for many years, in fact for many generations, the composer has suffered from his ignorance of market values and copyright limitations, and want of combination, while the publisher has gained by his extensive knowledge of business values and by his being able to deal with each composer separately. —I beg to remain, yours, &c.,

SIR,—The attention of the Council of the Society of British Composers has been called to an article in this month's issue of the Musical Times, entitled 'Royalty Agreements.'

As the article deals with controversial matters which are at present sub judice, the Council declines to discuss it.—Yours faithfully,

THE NATIONALITY OF FOLK-SONGS.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

SIR,—Mr. James A. Browne's letter under the above title must not be allowed to pass unnoticed. Forsooth, the argument as to the nationality of an air, whether English, Irish, or Scotch, is 'very stupid'! Dr. Ernest Walker rightly says that 'the popular tunes of England and Wales, Scotland and Ireland have their own broadly racial characteristics,' and he adds that 'the finest melodies of each race, bear upon them unmistakable signs of their origin. Were I to say that Irish folk-music 'is, on the whole, the finest that exists,' it might be put down to my patriotic leanings, but this statement is due to Dr. Walker, who also tells us that 'for sheer beauty of melody the works of Mozart, Schubert, and the Irish folk-composers form a triad that is unchallenged in the whole range of the art.'

Again, Mr. Browne states that the songs of Ophelia 'were entirely traditional until about the end of the 18th century, when Mr. Linley took them down as they were sung by Miss Field, and Dr. Arnold noted them from the singing of Miss Jordan.' This statement is at variance with facts. One of Ophelia's folk-songs was set by two distinguished Elizabethan composers, namely, by Giles Farnaby, Mus. Bac., about the year 1590, and by John Mundy, Mus. Doc., about the year 1595—both of which are to be found in the Fitzwilliam Virginal Book.

May I remind Mr. Browne that the fact of the airs being taken down in England or Wales or Scotland or Ireland does not altogether obscure their original provenance, and the diligent student of folk-music will soon recognize the racial characteristics of the air even in a varied guise. Fortunately, a number of old Irish MS. songs and ballads in the Irish language have the names of the tunes added, and thus we have a clue, in addition to tradition.—Yours faithfully,

W. H. GRATTAN FLOOD.

THE STUDY OF RHYTHM.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

SIR,—It is evident that Dr. Yorke Trotter fails to grasp the 'inwardness' of Greek rhythmical theory as much as I fail to understand his reference to 'the fallacy of the division of motion.' I have nowhere found any attempt to divide abstract 'motion' in Greek theory; on the contrary, Aristoxenus is very explicit in stating that rhythm cannot exist without some material, whether sound (as in music), bodily movements (as in the dance), or speech (as in poetry), through which it can act. And rhythm consists of the division of the time occupied by one of these materials, by means of arsis and thesis. The combination of arsis and thesis forms a foot, or measure, and the combination of several feet form a rhythm. All music must have a rhythmical basis, though the composer may obscure the arsis and thesis occasionally, for a definite object.

I do not understand Dr. Yorke Trotter's allusion to 'pauses.' A pause (fermate) serves to break the rhythmical flow. Does Dr. Trotter propose to break up Beethoven's beautiful rhythm by placing a pause at the end of every measure? If this is to be the result of Greek theory, then, like him, I would have none of it!—Yours faithfully,

C. F. ABDEY WILLIAMS.

PIANOFORTE TECHNIQUE.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

SIR,—Will you kindly give me a little space to make reference to the interesting paper on 'New ideas and ideals of music-teaching' read by Professor Niecks at the recent Edinburgh Conference of the Incorporated Society of Musicians and reported in your February issue? Professor Niecks's observations on the technique of pianoforte-playing, as promulgated by Steinhäusen and Breithaupt, were particularly interesting. It is true that Breithaupt pleads for a technique more in accordance with natural physiological conditions, and as a pupil of his I would like to bear testimony to his success in obtaining this object.

As Professor Niecks pointed out, finger and wrist gymnastics were formerly the beginning and end of the technique of pianoforte-playing. In Breithaupt's technique the upper arms and shoulders are the suppliers of energy, the forearms and hands merely the conductors of it. It is not strictly the case that Breithaupt sets aside finger work. What he urges is that 'all active isolated fingering—i.e., all finger spreading, over-stretching, clutching, pawing without participation of the weight of hand or arm, with stiff wrist or forearm—must be abandoned.' As the foundation of pianoforte-technique, Breithaupt pleads for the free, elastic, natural rhythmic movement of the combined playing-organs (shoulders, arms, hands, fingers).

By this change in technique important advantages are gained. It not only places greater possibilities, in a strictly musical sense, within the reach of the musician, but it also is a complete prevention of the muscular fatigue and pain that give so much trouble to pianists who pursue the prevailing method of 'finger and wrist' technique. The fatigue and pain arise mainly from the tightening and cramping of the muscles of the hand and forearm involved in the old system. For this system of rigid muscle substitute the technique urged by Breithaupt, and all risk of the players' trouble disappears.

An instance of this has come within my own experience. A young lady friend of mine, who had for years pursued pianoforte playing on the old system with considerable success, was, two and a half years ago seized by severe fatigue and pain in the muscles of the left forearm. Amongst others she consulted a leading Edinburgh physician, but nothing could be done, and ultimately she had entirely to abandon playing. Getting to learn of the Breithaupt technique, she took a three-months' course of instruction in that method, and is now able to play with the greatest ease and without the slightest pain or fatigue, even though practising three or four hours a day. Imagine my friend's delight at thus being able to resume her favourite pastime!—I am, &c.,

BREITHAUPT PUPIL.

A CHANT BY GOSS.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

DEAR SIR,—In the Musical Times for July, 1905, page 457, in your article on 'Great Composers and Chants,' there is the following statement: 'Goss arranged a double chant in F sharp minor from a subject by Jeremiah Clark, the origin of which is not at present traceable.' Not having seen this point cleared up in the Musical Times since the article in question appeared, I venture now to do so for you. The chant in question, which I take it, is No. 194 in the Westminster Abbey Chant Book, is evidently adapted from Clarke's hymn tune 'King's Norton,' No. 226, in Dr. Wesley's 'European Psalmist.'—Believe me, yours faithfully, (REV.) T. P. LEVETT.

CRITICISM OF MENDELSSOHN.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

SIR,—Lovers of the gracious and delicious strains of Mendelssohn at his best have been bearing in much patience, for years now, a constantly growing load. But the silence of one at least of these breaks down beneath the proverbial last straw, as embodied in several

HUDDERSFIELD.

The 'Mrs. Sunderland' Competition was held here on February 11. There was a large attendance. Five excellent mixed-voice choirs sang one of the most difficult and beautiful of Elgar's part-songs, 'Go, song of mine.' A second test was another searching piece, 'Let the canakin clink' (J. B. McEwen). The Arnley Choral Society (Mr. H. Pickard) came first, and the Bradford Vocal Union (Mr. W. S. Wilkinson) second. Six male-voice choirs sang 'Where is he?' (Beethoven), and 'The three fishers' (J. C. Ibeson). The Morley Vocal Union (Mr. S. Smith) was first and Todmorden (Mr. V. Lees) second. The children's choir reached a very high standard. Mr. Harry Evans, who adjudicated throughout the competition, said he had never heard more delightful children's singing at a festival. He found that the Heaton Day School, Bradford (Mr. J. H. Wilkinson), had 'the most delightful tone imaginable,' and the Ingrow Council School, Keighley (Mr. W. H. Whitaker), exhibited 'beautiful articulation, beautiful tone and splendid expression.' The tests were 'The shepherd's sirena' (Stanford) and 'The moon' (Myles B. Foster).

BLACKPOOL FESTIVAL.

The full report of the festival held last October is now issued in a booklet of 65 pages. It can be obtained from the Secretary, Festival Office, Blackpool. Price 9d., post free.

The following are extracts from the adjudicators' general remarks:

DR. McNAUGHT.

The 1910 Festival exhibited once again notable results in almost every department of its scope.

The achievements in the solo singing classes, in which there were the extraordinary number of 463 entries, were striking. I do not think the general average has ever been higher. It is remarkable that so many individuals have the courage to submit themselves to this ordeal, and to face public criticism. It is quite evident that the desire, or at least the hope of the great majority is to learn something, rather than to gain a prize. How can verbal criticism help? Not very much by itself, but it may accomplish something if it is read by the light of the actual performances. But it has to be admitted that many of our adjudicators necessarily employ terms that may not convey much meaning to competitors. Greatly daring, I have therefore ventured to give a few explanations, which I trust may be of use. They have no other authority than my own, and my colleagues may not endorse them.

The school singing was memorable. No finer results have ever been exhibited at a Blackpool Festival than those we heard from the Leyton (East London, be it noted) School Choir, trained by Miss Margaret Nicholls. The success of this choir disposes of the theory that good singing depends upon environment, hills, dales, soil, climate, &c. The really active environment is the teacher with a gift.

Two, or at most three, of the tests used at the Festival have provoked criticism which has received disproportionate notice. Some people, whose good opinion we all value, may have thus acquired a vague impression that the whole of the programme was at fault. Yet such a feeling could not survive a candid analysis. Elsewhere (in the Musical Times) I have tried to show that the tests used on this occasion form a list the merit of which has never been excelled at a Blackpool Festival, and, a fortiori, at any other festival of its class held in this country. Although I feel this to be true, I hope it may be possible to find artistic tests that will be worthy of the attention of first-rate choirs, without imposing any extraordinary difficulty.

MR. S. COLERIDGE-TAYLOR.

Perhaps the competition which disappointed me most was that of the string orchestra—the playing didn't seem nearly so good as that of two years ago.

But the singing was quite remarkable, and I hope every one realizes that it is only on such occasions that one can hear these difficult works done properly.

I was particularly pleased with the music chosen; and I don't think you and your Committee can be praised too highly for getting out of the beaten track.

Every one must have been much interested in the Delius and Debussy items—especially the latter.

Its inclusion was a most happy idea, for it brought an entirely new atmosphere to the notice of both choir and audience, and the result was so good that one forgave even the very bad English translation of the words.

I hope your example will be widely followed, because I do think there is a danger of these competitive festivals becoming too English and one-sided as regards selection of test pieces. (I hope I shall not be misunderstood!) It is quite a rare thing to see a French piece down on a competitive programme, and to me, personally, the fine renderings of the highly original and beautiful music of M. Debussy, were, as the Americans say, 'it'!

Moreover, it is distinctly refreshing to realize that there are still some places where such works can be introduced without the initial fuss and boom so prevalent in these times.

DR. A. HERBERT BREWER.

It is with the greatest possible pleasure that I send you my impressions of my recent visit to your competitive festival as an adjudicator, and I regret that I had not the opportunity of saying publicly what I now write. I was led to believe that the standard of singing at Blackpool was an exceptionally high one, but it surpassed all that I had anticipated. The choral singing was a revelation to me. Such artistic refinement, such tone, and such intelligence and enthusiasm have never before been so forcibly revealed to me. It is impossible to over-estimate the good that arises from these competitive festivals, especially when they are carried out on the very high level that yours is. The singing at the Saturday competitions must have been a great object-lesson to many of those who were privileged to hear it.

I should like to congratulate the Committee on the selection of music, which must have been a very difficult task, and which, with perhaps one exception, was admirable.

MR. PAUL LE VALLON.

There was no lack of good voices amongst the sopranos. The ladies placed first and second were most promising, though their interpretations and styles were very different. The worst, and a very general fault, was that of accentuating with the breath, showing that there was very little knowledge of what the Italians call 'appoggio della voce.' The rendering and expression were generally good, though there was a distinct lack of knowledge of how to obtain vocal colour and variety of diction.

There was some very promising material in the baritone class, though perhaps they did not attain such a high level as the baritones whom I judged four years ago at Blackpool.

The voices on the whole were good, and the intentions in most cases excellent, while many renderings displayed great intelligence. The voice-production generally was of too hollow and 'backward' a character. Many young singers labour (I use the word advisedly) under the delusion that a tone which sounds voluminous to themselves is necessarily effective and possessive of carrying power in a large hall: this holds good in very few cases. The 'mezza voce,' when employed at all in the aria, was somewhat clumsy and colourless. The pronunciation was often rough, and deficient in refinement and variety, more especially in the more tender passages.

MR. JOHN JAMES.

I have been wondering what would be the result if twenty festivals of the same magnitude and progression as the Blackpool Festival were held in various parts of England.

I believe they would rouse the latent talent of the villages and towns, and quickly remove the stigma 'that we are behind other nations in our appreciation of good music.' The educational value of your festival must be appreciated by all who have attended your concerts and competitions.

The choral singing reached a very high standard, and trust that some day—perhaps not in our time—a demand will thus be created for State-aided music, and that we shall have in this country the same advantages enjoyed by our German cousins. The voices—so far as I heard them—taken as a whole, are finer in tone and quality than I had expected. I think, however, a keener insight into the hidden meanings of both musical and literary text is desirable. More attention to the allied meaning of the poet and composer, portrayed by the singer with his own feelings and individuality—as apart from mere voice.

MADAME EDITH HANDS.

It appears to be generally agreed that competitive festivals—amongst which that of Blackpool is facile princeps—appreciably improve the standard of singing in their respective districts: and my experiences as

THE FARMER ROAD, LEYTON (LONDON, E.), SCHOOL CHOIR THAT WON FIRST PRIZES

and the tests chosen displayed a catholicity of taste which gave opportunities for the virtuosi choirs in the Challenge Shield Classes.

Modern composers would find a happier position for their part-songs at Blackpool and other kindred institutions if they would confine themselves to the apparent, instead of the nebulous idioms and orchestral treatment of the human voice.

MR. J. FRANCIS HARFORD.

My own idea is that such a festival spreads the knowledge of real music to an enormous extent. The very high standard set in all branches tends to set up a higher standard of teaching in all parts of the country. It assists the teacher to DARE to teach good music; it fosters a love of the better things, and so suggests to the pupil a desire to want something more than trite domestic sentiment. I hope adjudicator in this, my sixth year, confirms the impression that 1910 shows an advance both as regards artistic excellence and quality of voice. Individuals on previous occasions have done as well—but as a whole, in my two classes, the 1910 entry is the best I have listened to.

MR. CHARLES RISEGARI.

As regards the 32 young competitors who tackled the Fantaisie in C, by Mozart, almost all failed to produce the particular kind of tone necessary for Mozart; but it was most pleasing to prove that, apart from this fault, such a large majority could play this none too easy work so creditably.

The 'Ballade' by Chopin received a good rendering in many cases, three or four being quite excellent. With two or three exceptions, however, the poetic import of the piece was not realized.

MR. CHARLES H. FOGG.

I am glad the piano classes rose to the high standard of the Festival of 1910, which, after many years' experience, I consider the most successful you have ever had.

MR. EDWARD DE JONG.

As regards the adjudications which fell to my share, my impressions of the violin playing (Competition G, Class 3) were on the whole very favourable; yet I found that certain shortcomings of the candidates must have been attributable to some extent, I won't say inefficiency, but certainly to careless teaching.

We have at present no lack of good teachers in every branch of music, and it is of the utmost importance that only to those should be given the charge of aspirants to violin playing.

I noticed especially that in many cases the bowing was faulty, and this is owing, as I pointed out in my remarks at the conclusion of the competition, to a great degree, to the want of knowledge or strictness, or perhaps to both, of the teacher. These remarks also refer to the at times undesirable 'portamento' and 'vibrato.' Not a few indulged in the latter objectionable habit. I was, however, very pleased with the talent and really good performance of some of the candidates.

MR. JAMES BATES.

I have again to thank your Committee for the honour of adjudicating at your Festival. The solo boys, as a whole, were rather in advance of those of last year; their interpretation of Dudley Buck's 'When the heart is young' being very picturesque and effective. But there is a tendency nowadays for trainers of boys to overdo the 'head-voice,' and the result is a cramping of the tone. Too much attention is given to the 'oo' and 'aw' vowels, instead of practising all the English phonetics, especially 'ah.' The tone generally was pretty, but the allargando climax lacked breadth of tone.

The singing by the choir solo-boys of 'For my soul thirsteth' was not so good. With one exception the boys took the tempo too slowly, and the rhythm, phrasing, and at times the intonation, suffered in consequence. An experienced lady soprano would have had difficulty in giving effect to the solo at the slow tempo taken by the majority of the boys. All tried more or less successfully to give expression to the mood, and their earnestness in this respect caused them to miss the rhythm. It was most interesting to notice that not one of the fifty boys used forced tone, and great credit is due to their trainers for the care they have evidently taken to preserve their pupil's voices.

The following are some of the definitions referred to in Dr. McNaught's report:

RESONANCE.—The art of voice production is mainly the discovery of resonating cavities (places where the air can vibrate). Say there are potentially a dozen such cavities in the throat, mouth, and nose. Each of itself contributes a particular ingredient or tone quality by virtue of its shape, &c. Fine tone is a favourable amalgamation of all these tonal ingredients or tints into one composite colour. Every singer (by habit rather than by intention) favours some of these tints more than the others. Some exaggerate nasal or throat or other element of resonance. The will can exert little conscious influence over the small resonant cavities. But the brain, through the ear and memory of tone quality, automatically co-ordinates the action of the necessary muscles to imitate what it (the brain) conceives. Therefore listening to good tone helps a student to reproduce it more than volumes of print or the most skilful verbal instruction. As the musician's vocabulary is deficient in words that definitely describe the various qualities of resonance, resource is had to an idiomatic use of common words, that in a vague way associate themselves with peculiarities of vocal effect. Thus we say that a singer's voice is 'hollow' (lacking the reinforcement of beautiful resonance); 'dark,' 'bright,' 'pinched' (often literally true as regards the back of the throat); 'veiled,' 'open,' 'deficient in timbre' (not enough variety in the mixture of resonance).

TEMPERAMENT.—Inward emotion to which the voice is responsive. A fine voice does not imply temperament. It is only too often cold and passionless. Voice training does not of itself produce it, but it may clear the way for its vent. A child will often display it almost to perfection. A temperamental singer with a poor voice will often do more to make a song 'live' than a non-temperamental singer, however highly gifted and clever at vocalization.

INTERPRETATION.—Immersion of the personality of an executant into that of the poet or the composer's expression of the poet. The most artistic interpretation is attained when the executant concentrates voice, mind, and temperamental power wholly upon the task, and does not think of personal display, or even of the marks of expression. There may be several different but still fine interpretations of a great song, just as the individual may lean to this or that aspect of the poem and the composer's idea of the poem.

Mr. Rutland Boughton, of Birmingham, writing with reference to the Competition Festival now being organized to take place in that city, after remarking on the need of some wider outlook says:

So far as I can see, this desirable curiosity in regard to new music can be aroused (under present social conditions) only by the spirit of competition. We are assured that in the North this has already come about. We are assured that simple villagers and sophisticated factory workers alike have, by means of the competitive festival movement, been brought to that degree of musical understanding which enables them to recognize what is good in modern music, and even to prefer it. And, as a composer, I am bound to appreciate such a movement, however it conflicts with my theories. By all means, then, let us have it here also. We can easily keep our eyes open to prevent it developing sordidly or wastefully. In certain instances this movement has undoubtedly done something to limit and degrade the art of music. I have heard of choirs practising two part-songs a year to first-prize perfection, instead of enjoying adventurous sallies into new stuff for sheer love of discovery. The exaltation of passionate music and the tender joy of peaceful music are the ultimate aims of the art. To leave a rehearsal with large joy and pity in the heart is worth far more than the gambling excitement of competitive uncertainty, or the confidence of unnecessary perfection. However, we are not yet at the point where these dangers threaten. We must bear them in mind from the moment that our own choirs win first prizes; not before.

Arrangements are in progress for holding the first Wirral Musical Competition and Festival on Wednesday and Thursday, April 26 and 27, ample accommodation being provided for the event in the Auditorium, Port Sunlight. Competitors must be bona-fide residents within the area of the Wirral peninsula, including Birkenhead, and the scheme provides six classes in the senior competitions for choral and instrumental music and five classes in the junior competitions. The judge will be Mr. Nicholson, organist of Manchester Cathedral, and the Hon. Sec. is Miss Torr, Carlett Park, Eastham. There is a strong and representative committee, whose chairman is the Hon. Mrs. Henry Gladstone, and President the Countess Grosvenor.

First system of the musical score. It features four vocal staves and a piano accompaniment. The lyrics are: "tend thee, Their love doth tend thee, Till morn is bright, Watch by". The music includes dynamic markings mf and p, and the instruction tenderly. The piano part is in the lower register, providing harmonic support for the vocal lines.

Second system of the musical score. The lyrics continue: "thee are they keep - ing, While thou art sleep - ing, while thou art sleep - ing,". The music features a variety of dynamics including mf, p, and pp. The piano accompaniment continues with a steady rhythmic pattern.

Third system of the musical score. The lyrics are: "sleep - ing, sleep - ing, sleep - ing, Kiss'd by the night, kiss'd by the night." The music includes the instruction perdendosi (fading away) and dynamic markings p and ppp. The piano part features a prominent bass line that supports the vocal melody.

of the most recent of the sneering allusions made by more than one critic, in more than one paper or magazine, to that master. With such writers, the name that stands for something like the nadir of achievement (I speak of quality) in musical composition—the name to be pitched on as a foil to that of either of the acknowledged giants—seems to be that of the composer of the music to the 'Midsummer night's Dream'—of the Pianoforte trio in D minor—of 'Hear ye, Israel' and the Sanctus in 'Elijah,' of at least two truly noble Organ sonatas, and so much else of equal beauty.

What, exactly, is the idea—one would like to learn—of some critics, in making a point, not only of never giving necessary mention to Mendelssohn without a sneer, but of going out of their way to drag in his name for the purpose of bestowing that sneer? Is it that their distaste for him, alone among the greater composers, demands the relief of these little ebullitions?—or is it merely that it is less trouble to shoot at that ever-handy target than to select a fresh one?—I am, Sir, yours faithfully,

A. FORD.

'PELLÉAS ET MÉLISANDE.'

By ARNOLD SCHÖNBERG.

(FROM OUR BERLIN CORRESPONDENT.)

This time in writing of 'Pelléas' there will be no question of Debussy. The musical expression of the now familiar story is not exhausted by one version—in fact, one might wish that every capable composer would give his interpretation of this poem, as Heine said that every poet should write a 'Faust.' A second composer of unusual ability has taken Pelléas as pretext for a symphonic poem.

Arnold Schönberg is now thirty-six years of age and is still unknown to Grove. He is the composer of several groups of Lieder, two String quartets, and of more important works—a 'Kammer sinfonie,' a sextet for string instruments, 'Verklärte Nacht' (after Dehmel), and the present work, 'Pelléas et Mélisande.' Most of these compositions have scarcely been performed outside Vienna, where each in turn has received a welcome 'de scandale.' This is the best of signs, as Vienna has accorded the same reception to all its great musicians during the last hundred years, from Beethoven to Mahler. Schönberg had no difficulty in gaining the support of men who are both artists and musicians, such as Prof. Arnold Rosé and Oscar Fried, who have worked for Schönberg by playing his works.

Fried conducted 'Pelléas' at a recent concert of the 'Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde' for the first time in Berlin. It is Op. 5, but, as it is preceded only by Lieder, ranks among the larger works as Op. 1. It is written for the usual orchestra with quadruple wood-wind, eight horns, and the rest in proportion. It lasts fifty minutes. The work is divided roughly according to the play, and one may recognize the figures of Pelléas, Mélisande, Goland, and Ysaïre; and also certain scenes—in the forest, at the fountain, at the window, in the 'souterrains,' the final love-scene, and the death of Mélisande.

Of Schönberg's musical skill it is difficult for me to speak without exaggeration. To those who are not accustomed to hear music, his scores seem monstrous. But really they are complicated only in appearance. In performance the style is perfectly clear. Perhaps the principal characteristic of this style, and musically its greatest novelty, lies in the masterly modelling of the part-writing. Apparently each part is absolutely independent of the others. It is in their interweaving that Schönberg's extraordinary sense of the value of line combinations is realized. The art with which each part is put into relief is consummate. Schönberg has discovered a new meaning in counterpoint which makes, with that of Strauss, the only musical development of this art since Wagner. The strength of it lies in the certainty in the handling of the themes. Even his farthest-sought effects—such as the trombone glissando in Pelléas—are got in the simplest possible way, and never interrupt or attract attention from the general movement of the music. At the same time the work stands large and distinct to the last detail, a sign that Schönberg's invention is strong enough to include unity of impression. The wonderful colour which Schönberg obtains through the interweaving of melodies will take quite as long to get into people's heads as have the styles of Strauss and Debussy. It is easy to recognize the master in the strength of his material, from the great Pelléas theme to the slightest arabesque in 'Verklärte Nacht.' And there is only one judgment possible on the certitude and suppleness with which he carries his harmonic scheme forward. His harmonic style is without any trace of mannerism.

This appreciation has no pretence of being a full examination of Schönberg's music. In many respects it is imperfect. It was written eight or nine years ago, and by now Schönberg should have a much greater grasp of his means. It fails, as did the early works of Strauss, in cohesion between the various divisions, and seems, therefore, too long. Then Schönberg has some orchestral problems to solve. His extremely contrapuntal style should later yield wonderful orchestral effect. It must be admitted that 'Pelléas' suffers from inexperience in this respect. Meanwhile be it said that for the first time in German music can we see past Strauss. Schönberg's is the first path that leads anywhere forward, and we may confidently hope he will take us into as interesting places as his great predecessor.

INCORPORATED SOCIETY OF MUSICIANS.

The papers by Professor Niecks on 'New Ideas and Ideals of Music Teaching' and by Mr. Charles Manners on 'National Opera,' read at the Edinburgh Conference, were reported in our last issue. The remaining papers were 'Spanish Music' by the Rev. H. Carte de Lafontaine, and 'Musical Festivals, their history, purpose, and prospects,' by Mr. J. A. Rodgers.

SPANISH MUSIC.

Mr. de Lafontaine briefly described a few characteristics of Spain and the Spanish people, and went on to consider, as representative of the great church School of music which existed in Spain, principally in the 16th century, the composers Morales, Guerrero, Cabezon, and Victoria. He gave the following particulars: Cristoforo Morales was born in the beginning of the 16th century, and held posts at the Papal Chapel, at Toledo Cathedral, and in the service of the Duke of Arcos. The deeply religious trend of his character found expression in the composition of Masses, Magnificats, and Motets. For nearly three hundred and fifty years works of his have been annually performed in the place for which he designed them—the Papal Chapel at Rome. Francisco Guerrero, 1528-1599, a pupil of Morales, was occupied at the Cathedral of Seville for the greater portion of his life. At the age of sixty he made a journey to the Holy Land. An enormous number of his compositions have been lost. Antonio Cabezon, 1510-1566, was, it is said, blind almost from birth. He wrote an instruction book for the organ and a treatise on composition, the latter supposed to have contained the first piece of music ever written for string quartet. Cabezon's 'Diferencias' are considered to have anticipated Byrd's 'Variations,' which are usually looked upon as the oldest examples of the form. Tomas Luis de Victoria, born 1540, lived for many years at Rome, and probably had considerable influence on Palestrina. His creative style was the strongest in Spanish characteristics, and at the same time the most individual. The publication by Messrs. Breitkopf & Härtel of a complete edition of his works was begun in 1901 and is still proceeding. Portions of the music of these four composers and their School, Mr. de Lafontaine said, could be heard at Westminster Cathedral. Dealing with gipsies and their music, the lecturer quoted, with approval, the following opinion of a Spanish writer, Rafael Salillas: 'It must be conceded that the gipsy has no music of his own, no music that is essentially peculiar to his race, not even a song or a dance that can be called entirely his own. His songs partake of the influence of the peoples to whom he adapts himself.' The dance music of Spain, the lecturer said, was infinite in variety and could lay claim to great antiquity. He then entered into a long and interesting discussion of the various types of dance to be found in each of the different provinces of Spain, and described the 'Zarzuela,' which, next to the bull-fight, was undoubtedly the most popular form of entertainment in Spain to-day. It was, he said, practically an opera-bouffe, usually in one act, with any number of scenes and tableaux, lasting about one hour. Mr. de Lafontaine concluded with a review of the present state of creative and executive musical art in Spain.

MUSICAL FESTIVALS.

Mr. Rodgers concentrated his attention upon the great provincial triennial music-meetings, because he proposed 'to deduce from the past their influence upon the Art of Music, creative and executive, and to survey their position and possibilities.' The Three Choirs Festival, he said, claimed pride of seniority, as it dated from 1724. It passed through a critical period about 1874, when the Dean and Chapter refused an offer of £10,000 to the Cathedral Restoration Fund on the condition that the Festivals were stopped; but the dark days passed, and the Three Choirs Festival, under its present progressive directors, occupied a high place among musical gatherings. The Birmingham Festivals, Mr. Rodgers said, originated in 1768, with a musical entertainment established by the Hospital Board, which consisted entirely of 'Music by Mr. Handel,' including 'The Messiah,' which for many years was the mainstay of the gathering. Since 1784 the Festivals had been held triennially, save only in 1793. From the first they had been profitable, and the production of new works was and had always been a feature. The Norwich Festivals owed their origin in 1824 to Mr. R. M. Bacon, Editor of the Norwich Mercury. Their record was told in the 'History of the Norwich Festival,' by Robin Legge and Walter Hansell. There was a saying in Norwich—'If Birmingham has had its Mendelssohn, we also have had our Spohr.' 1839 was still called 'Spohr's year.' The primary policy of the Committee was now declared to be 'Art and not Charity.' Mr. Rodgers dealt more briefly with the younger festivals at Leeds, Sheffield, Bristol, Cardiff, and elsewhere, and proceeded to draw his general conclusions. With reference to the connection of music and charity Mr. Rodgers pointed out that the keenness in making a large profit might necessitate the lowering of the artistic standard, as manifested in the retention of hackneyed works; but that he saw little difference in this respect between the Charity Festivals such as Birmingham and Leeds, and the 'free' festivals like Sheffield and Cardiff, each of which saw the need of a profit, be it for a hospital or for a bank account. Dealing with the changes of popular taste, Mr. Rodgers said: 'One hundred years ago the Italian operatic aria, the florid vocal show-piece, such as "Cease your funning," with variations, flute fantasies composed by the executant himself, popular ballads such as "Black-eyed Susan," select airs by precocious choir boys, and songs composed and sung by local professors found a place in the festival programmes. Nowadays "snippets" are frowned at; operatic selections are almost exclusively Wagnerian, and even then are mainly confined to entire acts, or, at least, to self-contained scenes. The digestive capacity of festival audiences fifty years ago was harder than in our time. What do you think of this for a festival programme (Birmingham 1861)? "Messiah," "Samson," "Judas Maccabeus," "Elijah," "The Creation," Hummel's "Alma Virgo," part of "Israel in Egypt," and Beethoven's Mass in D.'

'We should do honour,' he added, 'to those far-seeing spirits who enlarged the literature of our Art by the commissioning of new works, and who imported into the country noble compositions and distinguished musicians whose coming furnished a stimulus and model to our native musical workers.' Mr. Rodgers then called attention to the printed list, distributed among the audience, of 476 original works and first performances in English produced with British festivals in the last 160 years. He admitted that as a rule novelties did not pay, but held that it was none the less incumbent upon Festival Committees to produce them, and said: 'A festival is the proper place for the introduction of a new work. At a great festival there are assembled just the people best qualified to judge the merits of a fresh composition. The leading critics and many of the most prominent professional musicians are there, and if the work chance to be good, the fortune of the work, and the reputation (though not necessarily the fortune) of the composer are made. Festival conditions, too, are favourable for the presentment of new compositions; orchestra, chorus and soloists are presumably the best available. . . . An "Elijah," a "Dream of Gerontius," an "Everyman," an "Omar Khayyam," a "Veil," counterbalance a hundred failures.'

With regard to finance Mr. Rodgers attributed the prevalent falling profits and actual losses in part to the high prices of admission. Many choral society performances, he said, fell but little short of festival standard: 'One can hear the London Symphony Orchestra under Nikisch for a shilling, or a great provincial choral society and orchestra under Richter, Stanford, or Wood for half a crown. Small wonder, then, that the serial-ticket buyer looks askance at paying five, six, or seven guineas for a set of eight tickets for a festival when he can get such splendid local music at far less proportionate cost. The remedy for this must lie in the cheapening of the cost of triennial festivals.' Mr. Rodgers did not, however, recommend economy in the engaging of orchestras.

The ideal festival committee, he said, should be a permanent body of enlightened business men of artistic equipment, with a leavening of practical musicians holding progressive views: 'Their festival should, at every concert, include some entirely new work, either originally composed or receiving a first performance in England. The latest developments and utterances in musical art and form should be welcomed and, if their intent and quality merit it—be given adequate production. Linked with the festival there should be operatic performances, not of standard, but of neglected or the most interesting new works, or such as are not ordinarily accessible in the provinces. Attention might be given to that languishing branch of the art, Chamber music, which at only one British festival—if we except the Musical League—that of Hereford, is officially recognized. This ideal committee in the intervals between the triennial festivals should busy itself with, so to speak, applying the teaching of the festival, labouring to establish permanent orchestras, founding, if possible, schemes of municipal opera, and persuading philistine city councils that music is as worthy and deserving a recipient of municipal aid and encouragement as are the sister arts of painting and sculpture.'

Dr. Bunnett, Dr. Coward, Dr. A. H. Mann, Mr. S. Midgley, and Lieut. Miller (Chairman) took part in the ensuing discussion.

On January 31 a lecture on 'Modern Composers' was delivered by Dr. A. Eaglefield Hull at Huddersfield. Pianoforte pieces by Rebikoff and Scriabine were played by Miss Edith Gledhill and Mr. Haydn Sandwell, and songs by Strauss were sung by Mr. Edgar Firth. Messrs. Sandwell, Lewis Eagland, and W. Singleton played organ pieces by Reubke, Max Reger, and Bonnet. The Cobbett Prize Phantasy Trio of Mr. J. Friskin was also given.

THE MUSICIANS' COMPANY.

A very interesting function in connection with the Company took place at the Stationers' Hall on January 24. At the dinner which preceded an entertainment, given in the large hall, it was announced that the Lord Chief Justice (Lord Alverstone), who was present, had been made an honorary freeman of the Company. His Lordship, whose interest in music is generally known to be keen, accepted the honour with much appreciation and warmth. The Master (Mr. Alfred H. Littleton) thanked Lord Alverstone for his eloquent speech, and alluded to the powers which appertained to the Musicians' Company in the olden days, and went on to say:

I was dreaming of our Company the other night. I dreamt that all our old powers had come back to us: all teachers of music, all singers, all players, in fact every musician in this country was once more under the control of the Worshipful Company of Musicians. We had promptly forbidden the manufacture or importation of all kinds of gramophones, of mechanical piano players, and all other instruments of torture. We regulated the size of orchestras, especially in regard to brass and instruments of percussion: in fact all musical outrages were stopped—except on very rare occasions, when largely augmented fees had to be paid. Even the great schools were amenable to our laws and regulations. We had just received a letter from the distinguished Principal of the Royal Academy of Music, who had recently returned from a triumphal progress through the musical capitals of Europe. In this letter he said that although he himself was in no sense in favour of the proposition, he was obliged to send it on to us for our consideration. Some of his students demanded permission to give a performance of 'Salome'—and the young lady who was going to undertake the principal part, who was just sixteen years of age, and had therefore plenty of experience of this kind of thing, declared that it was quite impossible to do justice to the part unless she were allowed to have the head of the Prophet; and as she particularly wished that the head to be used should be a real one, she would prefer the head of one of the chief professors of singing at a certain rival School, who had dared to insinuate that she was not good-looking enough for Comedy Opera, which she knew was really her line. The court after careful discussion replied with an emphatic negative. They told the Principal of the School that if the students wished to perform an opera, they must select one by an English composer, preferably one of his own; but if this were not possible, they might choose another, provided its composer was not less than twenty-one years of age.

About this same time the Company had nearly concluded negotiations with the Corporation of the City of London in regard to the Guildhall School of Music. It was already decided that the School should in future be entirely independent, and should be carried on without any regard to commercial considerations. The great point was that in future nothing later than Beethoven should be taught or played in the School, in order that the student should not try to run with the morbid and discordant sounds of ultra-modern music before he had learned to walk in company with the sublime melody and harmony of the older masters. It was admitted that this course might lead to a reduction of the number of students, and that the income of the School might be considerably reduced; but this would be made good from the Corporation funds—and if these funds proved insufficient, the Company would forego a portion of their fees payable by the School. What fabulous amounts of good work the Worshipful Company of Musicians might do, if we were only able to collect these fees!

Mr. Littleton went on to say that:

During the last few years we have been able to entertain our friends with good music at our occasional meetings. We have been able to render some slight service to other City Companies, and we shall always be ready to help when called upon. We have been fortunate in inducing distinguished musicians to write important pieces of music for us. It has been our privilege to encourage young composers by giving prizes for works in various branches of the art, and we have been instrumental in founding a number of scholarships at the Guildhall School, some of the holders of which will, we hope, one day take high positions. This evening I am taking the liberty of setting before you a little entertainment, on somewhat different lines from those we are generally accustomed to. With the very kind help of my friend, Mr. Cecil Sharp, and some of his pupils, we are going to ask you to listen to some folk-songs, and to see some Morris dances. I am very much indebted to Mr. Sharp for the great trouble he has taken in preparing this entertainment for us. I need not tell you that he is an expert, that he knows more of the subject than anyone living, that he has gone to original sources for all these songs and dances, and in fact rescued many of them from oblivion. Quite recently Mr. Sharp has made some fresh discoveries, some of which will be presented to you to-night; and many you will find quite new and of the greatest interest. I should like to call your special attention to one item in this programme, and that is some dancing by Mr. W. Kimber, who is one of Mr. Sharp's original sources. Mr. Kimber, I am told, is by profession a bricklayer, and still continues actively to adorn that profession. When I had the pleasure of seeing him dance, he gave me the impression of nothing less than a Greek statue, and I think you will agree that his grace and movements are absolutely classic.

Later in the evening a large company of guests assembled in the great hall to witness the display of folk-dances under the direction of Mr. Cecil Sharp. The programme included fifteen Morris dances, five Country dances, including 'Jenny pluck pears' and 'New Bo-Peep or Pickadilla' (from the 'English Dancing Master', 1650), and '29th of May' (from 'The Dancing Master', 1686), and, most notably, a Long-Sword dance from Kirkby Malzeard. Miss Mattie Kay and Mr. Fred Hudson also sang some folk-songs. The whole entertainment was greatly enjoyed by the audience.

INTERPRETATION IN SONG.

The subject of Mr. Plunket Greene's third lecture on Interpretation in Song, which was delivered at the Æolian Hall on February 3, was the making of programmes, a branch of singer's art on which too little thought is usually expended. Its vital importance, he said, lay in the two conflicting attitudes towards music which the lecturer discovered in the British public. He did not for a moment believe that the public had no taste: personal experience had convinced him that there was in most people an instinctive gift of discernment and a real faculty for appreciating the best. Song, on the other hand, was the public's staple food, and whatever the singer chose to offer was accepted without question in blind reliance on his judgment. Here the public made a serious mistake. For, in spite of the boundless field of choice presented by native songs only, the average British singer did not exercise his judgment at all; but for economic reasons, commercially sound if artistically deplorable, he exploited the 'royalty ballad' to the detriment of his art and the confusion of the public.

At this point Mr. Plunket Greene gave free play to his fancy, and analysed the different types of popular ballad with incisive humour. He laid bare the feeble triviality of the drawing-room love song and the mock religious sentimentality of the 'angel-song' with organ obligato. He exposed the folly of the 'beef-fed Britisher' who seeks within the limits of a ballad to reproduce the 'atmosphere of the East, and he expounded the simple 'local-colour' scheme which enables the least-gifted composer to make the course of Pat and Molly's love run smooth. His criticisms were as amusing as they were true, and delighted the audience. With the aid of a specimen programme, the lecturer indicated the main points which the conscientious singer must bear in mind. Sustained interest on the part of the audience could only be secured by variety in language, composer, key, rhythm, and style of technique. Above all, the emotional tension must be constantly varied to avoid the fatigue which springs from unbroken strain; and, the serious songs being done with, each programme should conclude with folk-songs or simple, strophic songs of more modern origin. These imposed a heavy tax on the singer, but (as Mr. Greene's illustrations proved) could be listened to with effortless interest.

We regret that owing to difficulties arising out of the printers' strike, we are compelled to hold over reports on Dr. H. W. Richards's paper on Organ Accompaniments, and Mr. Walter W. Cobbett's recently read paper on British Chamber Music.

Scholarships have been awarded at Trinity College of Music for the year ending December, 1911, to the following candidates: Hazel Giles (violin), Constance E. Martin (violin), Florence C. Mills (singing), Briana Prager (pianoforte), Grace M. Retzbach (elocution), Robert A. Strong (singing and elocution), Harold A. Wood (pianoforte and organ). Free tuition for one year has been awarded to the following: Harry Gardner (flute), Sydney Laubach (violin), Leonard H. Shaw (violin), and Kathleen C. Thompson. A special scholarship for local exhibitors has been awarded to Aileen V. Butler.

Owing to an illness, which we are glad to hear is not serious, Dr. Cowen was medically advised not to conduct the performance of his cantata, 'The Veil,' that had been arranged to take place on February 21 at Queen's Hall with the Cardiff Festival Choir. The performance was therefore postponed.

The first soirée ever held by the Royal Choral Society took place with great success at the Albert Hall on February 15. Sir Frederick Bridge presided over the 600 guests, and musical fare was provided by Mr. Morgan Kingston and the Alexandra Glee Singers.

The acting Archdeacon of Calcutta Cathedral, the Rev. Dr. Cogan, recently entertained the organist, Mr. Ernest Slater, and a party consisting of the Lord Bishop, canons and members of the vestry of the Cathedral at the United Service Club to celebrate the 25th anniversary of Mr. Slater's tenure of the post of organist and choirmaster at the Cathedral.

The fifth international Pianoforte and Music Trades Exhibition will be held at the Royal Agricultural Hall on August 14 to 19.

The Thomas Threlfall Scholarship for organ playing at the Royal Academy of Music will be open for competition in April. Candidates must be under twenty-one years of age and must first pass an examination in general education.

Mr. Tobias Matthay lectured on 'The Principles of Interpretation' at a meeting of the Music Teachers' Association held at Messrs. Broadwood's Rooms on February 18.

Mr. George Bernard Shaw will lecture for the London Schools Musical and Dramatic Association on 'The part played by Music and Drama in Education' at the Birkbeck College, Bream's Buildings, Chancery Lane, on March 28.

MISS MARIE BREMA'S OPERA SEASON.

TWO NEW FOREIGN OPERAS.

To the gratification of a large number of the opera-loving public, Miss Marie Brema, on January 26, began another season at the Savoy Theatre. On this occasion she abandoned her delightful reproductions of old masterpieces in favour of two entirely new works composed in the present day. These pieces, both of them short, and dealing with well-contrasted subjects, were written by M. Emanuel Moor, the Hungarian musician, some of whose chamber compositions have been heard in London. The first piece, entitled 'Wedding bells,' the words by L. V. Ferro, was based on a Swiss story. It told of an unfortunate state of affairs by which a young hunter had promised to marry one sister, while in reality his affections are given to her elder sister. The confession of mutual regard for her, made while preparations are in progress for the marriage to the other sister, forms the subject-matter of one act, while in the second the difficulties are finally settled by a convenient fire, in which the real lovers are allowed to perish. The chief features of the music are the duet between the unacknowledged lovers and some of the pastoral passages that accompany the doings of the village maidens. The demand for dramatic writing made by the final sacrifice to the flames is scarcely met in a manner that shows great command of resource. Miss Brema as the elder sister brought the extensive range of her art to bear with beneficial results to the music, and Mr. Spencer Thomas as the Lover revealed characteristics of voice and bearing that justify high aspirations for his future. The second piece had an historical basis, since it dealt with the celebrated Madame Pompadour, operatically termed 'La Pompadour.' Her influence secures for a young noble all the advancement he seeks in vain at other quarters. The trifling story provided an excuse for some pretty stage pictures of commendable historical accuracy, and on the composer's part for a series of tuneful musical numbers, in which the minuet measure seemed to predominate. Miss Brema was Madame Pompadour, Mr. Francis Braun a gallant object of her interest, and Miss Gladys Honey, the betrothed, for whose sake the moth seeks the candle. As usual, the chorus was well drilled in its work, and at all points the benefit of Miss Brema's gifts as a producer were apparent. An excellent orchestra was conducted by Mr. Frank Bridge. As an interlude, a terpsichorean effort designed by Miss Brema and styled 'A water dance' was performed. There were six representations of the bill, but it is clear that the public look to Miss Brema for rather more substantial work than these particular productions represented. For the old operas as she gives them there is a greater demand.

THE PALLADIUM.

The operatic monologues delivered by Miss Edith Walker were succeeded by a fortnight of something nearer to real opera, in which a whole Beecham company took part. For a week the 'turn' consisted of an excerpt from the second act of Tannhäuser, with full chorus and scenery. The audience were evidently interested, although no inkling of the plot was given them, and moreover it was some time before they could discover what language was being sung. However, the mounting was gorgeous. During the second week a resumé of 'Carmen' from the Toreador's song to the end was enacted, the scene being the Inn of the second act adjacent to the Ring of the fourth act. This was more varied, dramatic and intelligible than the 'Tannhäuser' selection. In both cases well-known artists took the principal parts, and Mr. Emil Kreuz conducted energetically. The season terminated prematurely. It is hoped that this will not be an end, even temporarily, of 'high-class music at the halls,' for the possibilities of such ventures have by no means been fully tested.

On Sunday, January 29, a crowded and enthusiastic audience listened to Elgar's Violin concerto, played by Herr Kreisler and the London Symphony Orchestra, under Señor Arbos.

LONDON CHORAL SOCIETY.

The energy displayed by this Society is remarkable. On February 15 the programme performed at the Queen's Hall was entirely by Beethoven. The overture to 'Coriolan' was the first item. This was followed by an excellent performance of Beethoven's seventh Symphony in A, which was obviously greatly enjoyed by the large audience assembled.

But the most notable feature of the programme was the great Mass in D, which, we believe, has not been performed by a London choir for many years. This physically arduous and difficult work was attacked most creditably by Mr. Fagge's experienced and well-trained chorists. No doubt a greater familiarity with the music would enable them to sing with even greater plasticity and a deeper emotional expression. But it is not likely that the Society will be disposed to perform very often this exhibition of Beethoven's genius and, we may add, disregard of the limitations of human vocal capacity. The soloists were Miss Perceval Allen, Miss Gwladys Roberts, Mr. James Hay, and Mr. Robert Radford—a fine quartet. As usual, the London Symphony Orchestra, led by Mr. Arthur Payne, co-operated, and Mr. Arthur Fagge conducted.

MR. MCCONNELL-WOOD'S CHOIR.

This Northumbrian Select Choir, of about fifty voices, paid a visit to London on February 4, and gave a concert in the Æolian Hall. Mr. McConnell-Wood is well known in his district as a capable choir-trainer. His resources justify the use of the word 'select,' for they certainly possess capital voices. The attack was good and the execution generally was finished. They have something yet to acquire in unity of tone-colour and fine rhythmic accent. The programme included Mrs. Meredith's 'Requiem on the death of Queen Victoria,' and her 'Sursus Corda.' Both works display the lady's gifts as a composer, and they were performed with conscientious care. A performance of Elgar's fine part-song, 'Weary wind of the West,' showed off the Choir to advantage, although in our opinion it was taken much too slowly, and therefore suffered rhythmically. The soloists were Miss Phyllis Lett, Miss Victorien Hopper, Miss Lillie Chipp, Mr. Maurice Pearce, Mr. Arthur Hopper, Mr. G. Parkinson (violinello), and Mr. McConnell-Wood conducted. The concert was one of the longest that has been given in London for some years.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

The fourth concert of the present season was given on February 9. The long symphonic suite 'Scheherazade,' by Rimsky-Korsakoff, was the first item. It did not make a great impression. The thematic material is not sufficiently interesting to justify the length of the work. Mr. Moriz Rosenthal played Chopin's E minor Pianoforte concerto, a 'Humoresque et Fugato sur un theme de Johann Strauss,' with his usual ability, and Miss Maggie Teyte contributed some French songs. Three orchestral pieces, Tableau musical 'Baba Yaga,' Légende 'Le lac enchante,' and 'Deux Chants populaires russes,' all by Liadoff, were performed for the first time in England. Dr. Chessin conducted. He did not seem completely 'at home' with the orchestra.

LONDON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Bach's 'Christmas Oratorio' was performed at the concert given on January 30. For this purpose the choir of the Halle concerts was imported from Manchester. All six sections of the work were given, but some necessary cuts were made. Bach did not intend that all the sections of the oratorio should be heard at one sitting, and for this reason it cannot be said that the work as a whole makes a very desirable concert programme. But it contains some of the composer's most delightful music. The choir showed excellent training. There was no conspicuously fine resonance, but the execution was rhythmic and often very expressive. The soloists were Miss Gleeson-White, Miss Marie Stuart, Miss Edna Barker, Mr. John Coates, and Mr. Campbell McInnes. Dr. Richter conducted, and Mr. C. M. Fogg was at the organ. The choir was trained by Mr. R. H. Wilson.

At the concert given by this orchestra at Queen's Hall, on February 12, Mr. Frank Bridge's symphonic poem 'Isabella' was played under the composer's direction. It is based on Keats's 'Isabella, or the Pot of Basil,' and illustrates the story in broad outline: a richly coloured opening section tells of two fervid lovers; a realistic middle section introduces a malign influence and depicts a catastrophe; and a final section expresses regret. The value of the composition lies chiefly in the abstract virtues of its workmanship and its attractiveness as orchestral writing. The remainder of the programme, conducted by Dr. Richter, included Beethoven's fifth Symphony, and the less familiar 'Love scene' and Scherzo from Berlioz's 'Romeo and Juliet,' Miss Tina Lerner played Chopin's F minor Pianoforte concerto.

NEW SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

With Madame Melba announced as soloist, a crowded audience was ensured for the concert given at Queen's Hall on February 14. Her programme consisted of 'Dove sono' from 'Figaro' and the Mad Scene from Ambroise Thomas's 'Hamlet.' There is no need to describe the manner in which Madame Melba sang these pieces. Of course there were 'encores.' The chief orchestral number was Tchaikovsky's fifth Symphony, which has served as a stepping-stone to Mr. Landon Ronald's reputation as a conductor. He again gave a brilliant interpretation which emphasized the buoyant rather than the morbid side of the music. The remainder of the programme consisted of Dvorák's 'Carneval' Overture and Strauss's 'Don Juan.'

QUEEN'S HALL SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

An interesting concert was given on February 4, under Sir Henry Wood. The purely orchestral numbers were Grieg's 'Lyrische suite,' Mozart's Symphony No. 29 in A, and Arensky's Variations on a Theme of Tchaikovsky. Mr. Emil Sauer played Beethoven's fourth Pianoforte concerto.

The inclusion of Wagner's Symphony in the programme of the concert given on February 18 served to satisfy curiosity rather than musical tastes. It was last performed in this country at a London Symphony Concert conducted by Mr. Henschel on November 29, 1888. The resemblance to Beethoven is in places striking, and there are glimpses of the idiom we have learned to associate with Wagner. Much of the music is devoid of the character that defines it as of the highest class, but it is always interesting and fluent. One has to remember that it was composed when Wagner was nineteen years of age. The remaining items of the programme were Schumann's A minor Pianoforte concerto, played with great lucidity by Herr Moriz Rosenthal, a Gluck-Mottl Suite and Humperdinck's 'Dream-Pantomime' from Hänsel und Gretel.

London Concerts.

ROYAL CHORAL SOCIETY.

The performance of Coleridge-Taylor's complete trilogy 'The Song of Hiawatha,' given by this Society under Sir Frederick Bridge at the Albert Hall on February 2, does not call for much comment. Their spirited and picturesque reading of the choral parts has been heard before more than once, and its characteristics were intensified on this occasion. The solo music was efficiently sung by Miss Amy Evans, Mr. Morgan Kingston and Mr. William Higley.

PATRON'S FUND CONCERT.

The following programme of new works was brought forward at the orchestral concert given at Queen's Hall on January 23:

Prelude, 'Thalatta' .. ..	Julius Harrison
Songs { 'The Owl' .. ..	Charles A. Rudall
{ 'Outward bound' }
Tone-poem, 'Astarte Syriaca' ..	Felix H. White
Contralto solo, 'La belle dame
sans merci' .. ..	George Dyson
Miniature Suite .. ..	Henry G. Dutton

Mr. Harrison's rapidly maturing style and technique caused his work to leave the best impression. He does not betray the struggle for true expression which could be watched in some of the other works. 'Thalatta' is founded upon a 'North Sea' poem by Heine, which it illustrates with great effectiveness. Mr. White's tone-poem, intended as a musical commentary on a sonnet of Rossetti, suffered from diffuseness and indefiniteness, but gave glimpses of inherent ability. The songs, which were interpreted by Mr. Evelyn Wood and Miss Dilys Jones, were of good quality, as was also the suite by Mr. Dutton. Brahms's Violin concerto was performed with Miss Dorothy de Vin as soloist and Sir Charles Stanford as conductor. The remainder of the works were conducted by their composers. The players were the London Symphony Orchestra.

An interesting event occurred on January 24, when the Brighton Festival Chorus, under Mr. Joseph Sinton, came to Queen's Hall to give a concert to benefit the Prince Francis of Teck Memorial Fund in aid of the Middlesex Hospital, and sang Verdi's highly dramatic and now rarely heard 'Requiem.' An excellent performance did credit to all concerned. The soloists were Miss Alys Bateman, Miss Hannah Jones, Mr. Ben Davies, and Mr. Edmund Burke.

The Royal Amateur Orchestral Society gave a concert at Queen's Hall on January 25, under the capable direction of Mr. Arthur W. Payne. Beethoven's 'Leonora' Overture (No. 3) was the most important of the independent orchestral pieces, and the high level of its interpretation showed that proportionate care had been given to its preparation. Chopin's E minor Pianoforte concerto was played by Mr. Ernest Schelling, and songs were given by Miss Ruth Vincent.

An attractive programme was chosen by the Stock Exchange Orchestral and Choral Society for their concert at Queen's Hall on February 3, given under the direction of Mr. Allen Gill (orchestral) and Mr. Munro Davison (choral). A sparkling performance of Dr. Cowen's overture 'The Butterfly's Ball' was conducted by Mr. Gill in the absence, through indisposition, of the composer. The programme also included Mr. MacCunn's 'Ship o' the Fiend' and M. Saint-Saëns's 'Phaeton.' The male-voice choir sang a selection of part-songs creditably.

Miss Kimpton's second orchestral concert for young people, given at Steinway Hall on February 4, was another success. The works played were Mendelssohn's 'Italian Symphony,' the first movement of Beethoven's C minor Pianoforte concerto, with Mr. Herbert Fryer as soloist, and Schubert's 'Rosamunde' Overture. As a useful preface Miss Emily Daymond gave some remarks upon the form and thematic material of the music to be heard. Songs were given by Mr. Harry Alexander, and Miss Kimpton conducted.

M. KREISLER'S CONCERTS.

At the concert given at Queen's Hall on February 7 the chief features were the three concertos for violin and orchestra, namely: No. 4 in D major (Mozart), B minor (Elgar), and that in D, Op. 35 (Tchaikovsky). M. Kreisler played all three works with great finish. The Elgar Concerto was received with much warmth. This result was achieved not only by the soloist, but by the highly-finished playing of the Queen's Hall Orchestra, under Sir Henry Wood.

CHAMBER MUSIC.

Undoubtedly the most vital thing in London concert-giving during the last few weeks has been the performance of chamber music. Trio, quartet and quintet parties have appeared in such frequent succession that we can do little more than summarize their activities.

The Classical Concert Society gave concerts at Bechstein Hall on January 25, February 1, 8 and 15. On each occasion solo and concerted instrumental playing divided the chief interest. At the first Mr. Fleury (flute), Mr. Frank Bridge (viola) and Mr. D. F. Tovey (piano) played Beethoven's Serenade in D. At the second, Beethoven's B flat Pianoforte trio was played by Miss Marie Motto, Mr. Ivor James and Mr. Leonard Borwick. At the third, Messrs. Maurice Sons, Frank Bridge and Percy Such were associated in Beethoven's String trio in G (Op. 9, No. 1), and Mr. D. F. Tovey replaced Mr. Bridge for the performance of Brahms's C minor Pianoforte trio. Mr. Sons showed his exceptional gifts as a solo player with Bach's 'Chaconne.' On February 15, the executants were the English Quartet, and the programme included the fourth performance of César Franck's Pianoforte quintet in London within one month.

The Strings Club gave one of their 'open' concerts at Steinway Hall on January 28, and performed Dohnányi's Pianoforte quintet in C minor. The usual string players, led by Mr. Alfred Gibson, were joined by Mrs. Alfred Hobday.

The difficult question, Which is the finest existing quartet party? was probably settled in many English minds by the visit of the Rosé Quartet from Vienna, consisting of Messrs. Rosé, Fischer, Ruzitska and Buxbaum. At a Broadwood Concert, given at Æolian Hall on February 2, they played quartets by Brahms (A minor), Haydn (F) and Beethoven (E flat, Op. 127). At another Broadwood Concert, on February 9, they played quartets by Mozart and Haydn, and were joined by Misses Patience and Maud Lucas in Brahms's Sextet for strings in B flat, Op. 18. They also gave two concerts at Messrs. Broadwood's rooms on February 4 and 8, with programmes that included Brahms's F minor Quintet (pianist, Mr. Richard Epstein) and Clarinet Quintet (with Mr. Charles Draper).

The newly-associated Henkel Pianoforte Quartet gave their second concert at Steinway Hall on February 3, with a programme in which M. d'Indy's A major Quartet, Op. 7, was the most interesting feature, in anticipation rather than in realization.

The Walenn Quartet were heard in quartets by Brahms, Hurlstone (the prize 'Phantasy') and Haydn at Æolian Hall on February 7. On the following day the Wessely Quartet gave, in conjunction with Mr. York Bowen, a striking performance of César Franck's Pianoforte quintet.

Miss Ethel Barns's pleasant Suite for piano, violin and violoncello was again brought forward at a Barns-Phillips concert at Bechstein Hall on February 7.

On February 9, when the Rosé Quartet made their last appearance, the superb Brussels Quartet challenged comparison with them in a programme, given at Bechstein Hall, that included M. Maurice Ravel's fascinating Quartet in F major.

The Alfred Roth Chamber Trio made their first appearance at Steinway Hall on February 14, and carried out an interesting programme. On the same evening the Sevcik Quartet gave their only concert this season at Bechstein Hall. They played Glazounoff's Quartet in A minor, Dvorák's Pianoforte quartet, Op. 87, and Schubert's Quintet, Op. 163. The pianist was Mlle. Ella Spravka, and the second violoncellist Miss Audrey Chapman.

Those who know Mr. Holbrooke's music had to be disappointed at the omission, because of 'insufficient rehearsal,' of his new Clarinet quintet from the programme of his concert at Steinway Hall on February 17. The quintet 'Diabolique' was substituted. Strauss's Quartet in C minor was also in the programme, which was admirably carried out by Messrs. Sammons, Petre, Waldo Warner, Warwick Evans and the concert-giver.

The London Trio gave an admirable interpretation of Beethoven's Trio in D major, Op. 70, at Æolian Hall on February 20. Grieg's A minor Sonata for piano and violoncello was played by Madame Goodwin and Mr. Whitehouse, and solos were given by Mr. Simonetti (violinist) and Mr. John Savile (vocalist).

VOCAL RECITALS.

Mr. Murray Davey gave a 'recital of his musical impressions of some beautiful poems in the English and French languages,' at the Little Theatre, on January 26. The majority of the poems chosen were French, and in these Mr. Davey was at his best as a composer. As a singer he was excellent throughout.

Miss Elena Gerhardt chose a programme that was mostly familiar for her recital at Bechstein Hall on January 26, which was for the greater part a welcome strengthening of previous impressions. Miss Paula Hegner accompanied. A further recital was given by Miss Gerhardt at Queen's Hall on February 8, with great success.

Miss Gwladys Edwards, an Australian soprano, made a successful London début at Æolian Hall on January 31, revealing a voice of considerable attraction.

An interesting concert was given at Steinway Hall, on February 2, by Miss d'Auvergne Upcher (contralto), assisted by Mr. J. Harry Irvine (reciter). The former sang a well-chosen selection of songs with agreeable vocal tone and expression.

Mr. Alfred de Manby (baritone) and Mr. Gwilym Wigley (tenor) sang operatic excerpts at Bechstein Hall on February 7.

The Grand Ballad Concert given by Madame Clara Butt and Mr. Kennerley Rumford at the Albert Hall on February 8 naturally drew a large audience. Madame Butt's list of songs included a new one, 'Thanksgiving,' by Dr. Cowen. The concert-givers were assisted by Miss Ada Forrest, Mr. Ben Davies, Signor Alessandro Certani (violin) and Mr. W. H. Squire (violoncello). On the same day Miss May Williamson gave an excellent recital at Steinway Hall, with a well-chosen programme.

Mr. George Henschel's distinguished style gave great pleasure to a large audience at Bechstein Hall on February 11. Ballads by Loewe occupied a prominent place in an entirely German programme. On the same day Mr. Paul Reimers gave a recital at Æolian Hall.

Miss Geraldine and Mr. Frederick Dillon, South African vocalists, gave a recital at Bechstein Hall on February 15.

Signor Enrico Tiberio achieved considerable success in making his first appearance in England as a tenor vocalist at Bechstein Hall on February 16. Mr. Tait-Knight's recital on the same day served to reveal a baritone voice of excellent possibilities.

PIANOFORTE RECITALS.

M. de Pachmann gave a characteristic recital before a large audience at Queen's Hall on January 25, and gave his first performance in London, we were told, of Chopin's B minor Sonata. His playing was again a reminder of what it had been in past years.

Mr. Harold Samuel, the accompanist, gave a successful recital at Æolian Hall on January 26, with Beethoven's Sonata in E (Op. 109) as the chief number. On the same day Mr. William Murdoch, an Australian pianist, made his first appearance in London at Bechstein Hall, and earned great admiration for his musical gifts and technical ability.

M. Godowsky introduced into his programme at Bechstein Hall on January 28 a Sonata of his own composition. It was, as expected, a work of great brilliance, technical elaboration, and difficulty. He also played Beethoven's 'Thirty-two Variations' and pieces by Brahms and Chopin.

Mr. Ernest Schelling also came forward as a composer, in giving a recital at Queen's Hall on January 31, and interpreted his highly interesting and cleverly worked-out Variations in F sharp minor, dedicated to his master, Paderewski. Throughout the programme, which included Brahms's Op. 117, and the Capriccio, Op. 116, and also a group of Chopin pieces, his playing was, as usual, of distinguished quality.

Miss Clara Blackburne gave a recital at Bechstein Hall on February 2, with the assistance of the New Symphony Orchestra, under Mr. Landon Ronald. The chief works played were Concertos in C minor by Mozart and E flat ('The Emperor') by Beethoven.

Miss Adela Verne, after an absence of several years' duration from the London concert platform, reappeared on February 10, giving a recital at Bechstein Hall. Her playing was as distinguished as ever.

Considerable progress was indicated by the singing of the St. Margaret's Musical Society, under the direction of the Rev. Jocelyn Perkins, at the Royal Horticultural Hall on January 26. The chief choral numbers were Elgar's Suite 'From the Bavarian Highlands,' of which an attractive reading was given, and MacCunn's 'The Wreck of the Hesperus,' which was performed with spirit. The concert version of German's 'A Princess of Kensington' was also in the programme. The soloists were Miss Mabel Todd and Mr. Frederick Norcup.

A 'Burns Night' concert given at the Albert Hall on January 28 was a great success. The soloists were Miss Agnes Nicholls, Madame Ada Crossley, and a host of others, and a part of the programme was undertaken by the band of the Scots Guards, under Mr. F. W. Wood, and the pipers of the Scottish Clans Association of London.

The Spring Festival Concert of the London Sunday School Choir took place at the Albert Hall on February 11, in the presence of a large audience. Mr. William Whiteman conducted a choir of the usual enormous dimensions in a programme that included a selection from Maunder's cantata, 'Olivet to Calvary,' 'Fixed in His everlasting seat' from Handel's 'Samson,' 'No shadows yonder, from Gaul's The Holy City,' the anthems, 'Awake up, my glory' (Barnby) and 'Most glorious Lord of life' (West), and several part-songs. The singing was precise and agreeable in tone. Mr. Wesley Hammet conducted the orchestra in independent numbers, and solos were sung by Madame Ada Crossley and Mr. Plunket Greene. Mr. Horace G. Holmes accompanied at the organ and Mrs. Mary Layton at the pianoforte.

On February 20 a novel feature of musical interest was included in the programme at the Hippodrome. It consisted of the singing of part-songs by a small choir from the village of Wognum, in North Holland, conducted by the Mayor, Herr Jacob Kwast. The tone and expression were excellent, and a high state of cultivation was indicated.

Suburban Concerts.

The East Finchley and Muswell Hill Musical Society opened their ninth season with a concert at the Athenæum, Muswell Hill, on January 25, when Stanford's 'Songs of the Fleet' and 'The Revenge' were given, together with Coleridge-Taylor's 'Death of Minnehaha.' The soloists were Mr. Cynlais Gibbs, Miss Carrie Tubb and Mr. Thorpe Bates. Mr. George R. Ceiley conducted.

'The Woman of Samaria' (Sterndale Bennett) was performed by the St. Paul's Choral Society, East Molesey, in the church on February 1. The soloists were Miss Ada Tunks, Miss Lily Gover, Mr. Sydney Clark and Mr. T. Powley. Mr. H. Gresham was the organist and Mr. P. Macdonald conducted.

An enjoyable concert was given by the string orchestra of the Croydon Conservatoire of music in the Large Public Hall on February 3. The instrumental numbers were chosen from the works of Fuchs, Bach, Purcell, N. Sokolow and Tchaikovsky, and were excellently played under the direction of Mr. W. H. Reed. Songs were given by Miss Dorothea Webb and a violin solo by Miss Hilda M. B. Sellars.

On February 4, Mr. Julius Harrison made his first public appearance as conductor of the Dulwich Philharmonic Society, and directed an excellent performance of Sullivan's 'Golden Legend.' He appeared to be in every way well qualified for his new post, as he exercised an easy command over his forces and obtained good results. The soloists were Miss Leah Felissa, Miss Effie Martyn, Mr. Harold Wilde and Mr. Thorpe Bates. The orchestra played Beethoven's first Symphony creditably.

A creditable performance of Mr. Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha' was given by the Crystal Palace Orchestral Society, assisted by the Crystal Palace Choir, on February 11, under the direction of Mr. Walter W. Hedgcock. The soloists were Miss Esta d'Argo, Mr. Gwilym Richards and Mr. Julien Henry.

The Lavender Hill Choral and Orchestral Society gave a highly creditable performance of Mendelssohn's 'Hymn of Praise' at Wandsworth Town Hall on February 15, under the capable direction of Mr. George Lane. Both choir and orchestra carried out their duties in a highly efficient manner. The vocal soloists were Miss Maud Willby, Miss Janet Cook, Mr. Ernest Penfold and Mr. Reginald Davis, and in the miscellaneous section solos were given by Master Frank Lane (violin) and Miss Ethel Davis (harp).

On February 17 the Ealing Philharmonic Society gave a successful performance of Sullivan's 'The Golden Legend' under the direction of Mr. Victor Williams. The soloists were Miss Elaine Birch, Miss Mildred Evans, Mr. Gwynne Davies and Mr. Thorpe Bates.

Music in the Provinces.

BELFAST.

The third concert of the Philharmonic Society's season took place on February 10. The orchestra distinguished itself by a really good performance of Schubert's 'Unfinished Symphony.' This was followed by the magnificent motet of J. S. Bach for double choir, 'Sing ye to the Lord.' Only those who have inner experience can appreciate the labour of the training of a large, totally amateur choir in such a work, and how they deserve to be congratulated on a really great performance. The motet takes nearly twenty minutes to perform, and yet at its last chord there was scarcely a distinguishable fall in tone. To Dr. Koeller is due the credit of this truly remarkable success.

The solo singers were Madame Blanche Marchesi and Mr. Walter Hyde, and Miss Norah Drewett contributed several pianoforte solos.

The choir also sang Debussy's part-song 'Cold winter! Villain that thou art,' and the orchestra, besides accompanying a duet from Gounod's 'Romeo and Juliet' and several songs, concluded an excellent concert with 'Finlandia,' by Sibelius.

BIRMINGHAM.

The Midland Musical Society's fine performance of Handel's 'Samson,' under Mr. A. J. Cotton's able direction, which took place in the Town Hall on January 28, proved an event of more than ordinary interest inasmuch as this work had not been heard here for some years past. The choir sang exceptionally well, the voices being clear and resonant, and in matters of expression, attack, and gradation of light and shade the chorists realized artistic effects. There is considerable demand made upon the soloists, and it is only just to state that the principals—Miss Elsie M. Yardley, Miss Lilian Holloway, Mr. Ernest Pike, and Mr. Herbert Parker—acquitted themselves in a laudable manner. Mr. C. W. Perkins occupied his customary place at the organ.

Interesting recitals were given by Miss Kathleen Bruckshaw and Mr. Arthur Cooke, pianists of high artistic attainments. The former appeared at the Queen's College on January 24, and the latter in the large lecture theatre of the Midland Institute on January 28.

Special interest was attached to the Birmingham Philharmonic Society's fifth concert given in the Town Hall on February 1, the occasion being the appearance of Mr. Thomas Beecham as conductor. He proved himself to be a master of his art, and conducted with energy and tact, securing a remarkable performance of Strauss's stupendous symphonic poem 'Ein Heldenleben,' the finest yet heard in Birmingham, surpassing that given under the composer's direction in 1904. A novelty was Delius's tone-poem 'Paris.'

The Birmingham Choral Union once more secured an overflowing audience at the Town Hall on February 4, with their annual performance of the 'Messiah.' The newly abridged version was used, the Hallelujah Chorus coming as the Finale of the oratorio, the other numbers being arranged in the progressive order of their spiritual significance, omitting many sections of little importance. The choir and orchestra were quite excellent, and the work of the principals was in every way artistic. The soloists were Miss Eva Rich, Miss Olive Pank, Mr. Walter Lawley, and Mr. James Round. Mr. Thomas Facer conducted, and Mr. C. W. Perkins was at the organ.

Of more than ordinary interest was the concert given in the Town Hall, February 11, by the Midland Musical Society orchestra, augmented on that occasion to eighty performers. Mr. A. J. Cotton, the able conductor, submitted a programme of a high standard for a Saturday Night Popular Concert, which included Beethoven's 'Pastoral' Symphony and Mozart's Serenade for strings, in G. The performance, if not flawless, was exceedingly praiseworthy. The vocalist was Mr. H. Parker, bass of Lichfield Cathedral.

Sir Henry Wood conducted the sixth orchestral concert of the Birmingham Philharmonic Society at the Town Hall, February 15, the whole programme being devoted to excerpts from Wagner. The vocalist was Madame Gleeson-White, who took the place of Miss Edith Evans, the latter being prevented from keeping her engagement.

BRISTOL.

The Bristol Temperance Choral Society gave on January 30 their thirteenth annual concert before a large audience. Under the competent direction of Mr. F. Stone, J. L. Hatton's 'Robin Hood' and Roland Revell's 'Outlaw's wooing' were performed, the soloists being Miss Towena Thomas, Mr. J. S. Perry (Wells Cathedral), Mr. J. W. Davey, and Mr. Alfred de Manby.

On February 8, at the Victoria Rooms, the Bristol Symphony Orchestra gave the second concert of the fourth season. Mr. F. S. Gardner acted as conductor, and Mr. Maurice Alexander held the principal violin.

The Clifton Quintet gave the third concert of the season on February 9, at the Victoria Rooms, the players being Messrs. Maurice Alexander and Herbert Hunt (violins), Ernest Lane and Alfred Best (violons), and Percy Lewis (violinello). Two string quintets were performed, namely, those of Brahms in G major (Op. 111) and Mozart in G minor. These were excellently presented, and appeared to interest the large audience deeply. Mr. Herbert Parsons played Beethoven's 'Sonata Appassionata,' and Mr. Maurice Alexander executed violin solos with skill.

DEVON AND CORNWALL.

THE THREE TOWNS.

On January 25, simultaneously with a visit of Madame Clara Butt and party to the Plymouth Guildhall, attracting a huge audience, the Plymouth Orpheus Male-Voice Choir gave a concert at Devonport with a programme of part-songs, madrigals, and choruses by Abt, Sullivan, de Rille, Buck, Stanford, MacDowell, and Adams. The same choir presented an interesting programme at the Plymouth Corporation Saturday Concert on February 11, making a special success with 'The martyrs of the arena' (de Rille), and showed capacity for lighter effects in Boulanger's 'Cyrus in Babylon,' German's 'O peaceful night,' and Muller's 'Spring's delights.' Mr. David Parkes is the conductor of the Choir.

A prominent event was the first performance in Plymouth of Elgar's 'Caractacus' on February 8, by Dr. Weekes's Choral Society, assisted by members of the Orchestral Society and professionals, and Miss Mabel Manson, Messrs. Lloyd Chandos, Charles Tree and Joseph Farrington. The tone of the choir was refined, elastic and true, allowing for numerical weakness in the tenor section, and their performance showed earnest work and attention to detail. Mr. Walter Weekes conducted, and the work closed with an exceptionally fine performance of the final chorus.

Mr. R. G. Evans's symphony concerts have steadily advanced in support and are a particularly educative and artistic feature of musical art in Plymouth. At the concert on February 14 the symphony was Mozart in E flat.

DEVONSHIRE.

Teignmouth Choral Association sang 'The Creation' on February 2, under the direction of Mr. E. E. Fridham, the choir numbering one hundred voices, with Miss Dunford, Messrs. J. S. Perry and W. J. Belgrove as principals, and Mr. W. J. Brown at the organ. Cowen's 'The sleeping beauty' was performed by the Plympton Choral Society of sixty voices on February 15, conducted by Mr. David Parkes. In the miscellaneous section, part-songs by Parry, Wood, and Fanning were included. The band was led by Mr. Arthur Coombe.

CORNWALL.

The amalgamated Truro and Falmouth Philharmonic Societies performed 'The Golden Legend' at the latter place on January 30, repeating it in the cathedral city on the following date. Rev. Canon Corfe conducted, the choir doing creditable work, considering evident weakness in the male sections. The Misses Dalrymple, Kirkwood, and Messrs. Ellis and Dan Price were the principals, the band being led by Miss Hoskins with Miss Edith Blight at the organ. Camborne Orpheus Glee Choir, conducted by Rev. J. H. Duerden, carried out a good programme excellently on February 1; and the Mousehole Male-voice Choir, now twelve months old, sang well on February 4, under the bâton of Mr. William F. Bryant. February 8 was the occasion of the St. Dennis Orchestral Society's concert, when Mr. G. Allen led and conducted a successful performance. A new organ was opened in the Delabole United Methodist Church (Pengelly) on February 9 by Mr. Frank Harris, of Exmouth.

Under the direction of Mr. R. R. Glendinning, the Bodmin Choral Society sang 'The ancient mariner' on February 15, with principal singers from the district. Mendelssohn's 'Capriccio brillante' for pianoforte and orchestra was performed, with Miss Ethel Randell as soloist. Launceston Choral Society, who well uphold the standard and musical performance in North Cornwall, on February 16 performed 'Judas Maccabæus,' conducted by Mr. P. S. Parsonson, with Miss Norah Newport, Messrs. Charles Saunders, and Dan Price as principals. On the same date the Callington Choral Society, in only its second season, ambitiously undertook to perform Mendelssohn's 'Elijah,' under their conductor Mr. J. H. Lucas. The Society, which contains some excellent choral tone, has worked well since its organization.

DUBLIN.

The Royal Dublin Society chamber music recitals have been specially interesting during the last month owing to the fact that local musicians have contributed to the excellent programmes. The Sunday Orchestral Concerts finished for the season on February 5. There was an overflowing audience, which included His Grace Archbishop Walsh (a very regular attendant of these concerts).

Several miscellaneous concerts have been given during the month, including the Commercial Rowing Club concert, which is worthy of mention as Miss Margaret Dempsey (who has had a couple of years' study and operatic experience in Italy) made her first public appearance at it since her return. Mr. Wilfred Douthitt also sang, and increased the reputation he gained here at the Tetrizzini concerts last autumn.

A complimentary concert to Mr. George Burbridge White (a young Dublin man with a pleasing tenor voice) also deserves mention. The object of the concert was to enable Mr. White to pursue his studies as a vocalist.

On February 2, Miss Agnes Nicholls, Miss Carmen Hill, Mr. Ben Davies, Mr. Robert Radford, Miss Hilda Saxe, and Mr. Hamilton Harty gave a concert under Mr. H. B. Phillips's direction. Mr. Vincent O'Brien was the accompanist.

At the Royal Dublin Society, lectures were given on February 8 on 'Bells and their Harmonic Tones' by Mr. W. W. Starmer, and on February 10 on 'The Origin of the Opera' by Dr. Esposito, with musical illustrations from Caccini's and Monteverde's operas sung by Miss Nettie Edwards.

On February 15, the Philharmonic Society, conducted by Mr. Charles Marchant, gave a very good performance of Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha's Wedding-feast' and 'The Death of Minnehaha,' with orchestral accompaniment. The choir, though not large, was very reliable and thoroughly satisfactory, and the band well balanced. The solos were sung by Miss Kathleen McCully, Mr. Dan Jones, and Mr. Vine Sanderson. The audience was disappointingly small, probably owing to the serious counter-attraction of 'Sousa and his Band.'

EDINBURGH.

Messrs. Paterson's present season's series of orchestral concerts was brought to a close by the concert given in the M'Ewan Hall on February 6. The chief feature of interest was the first public performance of M. Emil Mlynarski's new Symphony in F major. The work contains much beautiful thematic material of a distinctively Slavonic character, and the orchestration is extremely skilful and abounds in gorgeous effects of tone-colour. The soloist of the concert was M. Emil Sauer.

The third of four Historical Concerts, given under the direction of Professor Niecks, was held in the University music class-room on January 25. The programme was devoted to a recital of songs by Schubert and ballads by Loewe. Mr. George Henschel was the vocalist, and to his own accompaniment sang the various numbers in a musicianly style which delighted the audience.

The fourth of the historical concerts, on February 15, consisted chiefly of a recital of eight-part wind-instrument music, conducted by Mr. H. Verbruggen.

The second of three chamber concerts given by the new local string quartet consisting of Miss Emily Buchanan, Miss Dorothea Shephard-Walwyn, Miss Dorothy Chalmers and Mr. D. Millar Craig, took place in St. Andrew's Hall on February 3. The players gave careful and much-appreciated performances of Haydn's Quartet No. 1, in G major, and Schubert's posthumous Quartet in D minor. Miss Jean Waterston was heard to advantage in songs by Sinding, Lange-Müller and other composers. The accompanist was Mr. W. B. Moonie.

The second concert of a series arranged for 'young people of school age,' and given under the auspices of the Edinburgh Musical Education Society, was held in the Queen's Hall on February 10. Professor Niecks presided, and, as at the former concert, prefaced the various items in the programme with explanatory remarks of an interesting and educative nature. The Verbruggen String Quartet gave admirable renderings of Haydn's 'Emperor' Quartet and the last movement of Schubert's Quartet in A minor. Miss Jean Waterston contributed songs, and Mr. Henri Verbruggen played as violin solo Saint-Saëns's Introduction and Rondo Capriccioso. Miss Ailie Cullen was the accompanist.

GLASGOW.

The performance of an opera on the concert platform is seldom very satisfactory, and this was felt on January 31, when 'The Flying Dutchman' was given by the Choral Union and the Scottish Orchestra. With the exception of a total collapse of the tenors and basses towards the end of the work, the choral numbers were sung with good effect. The instrumental part was splendidly interpreted by the orchestra, and of the soloists—Miss Susan Strong and Messrs. Maurice D'Oisly, Frederic Austin, and Arthur Winckworth—Mr. Austin's fine declamatory reading of the part of the Dutchman was a feature. The performance had the benefit of Mr. Mlynarski's skilful direction. The last Classical Concert, on February 7, was in some respects one of the most notable of the entire series.

Mr. Mlynarski appeared in the dual rôle of conductor and composer, his new Symphony in F being given for the second time in this country (it had been played in Edinburgh the previous evening).

An instance of the excellent pioneer work being done by the Glasgow Bach Choir was the capital performance—probably the first in Britain—of the master's 'Trauerode' in St. Mary's Cathedral, on February 6. An English edition of this fine work is now published by Messrs. Novello under the title of 'Lord, rebuke me not,' and is thus available for English choirs. The Choir also sang with fine effect excerpts from 'Praise Jehovah in His splendour,' the 'Christ-mas Oratorio,' and the 'St. Matthew' Passion. Mr. J. M. Diack conducted the performance, and the organ accompaniment was skilfully played by Mr. G. T. Pattman, the organist of the Cathedral.

The Choral and Orchestral Union's season was brought to a close with the annual plébsicite concert on February 11, the programme selected being Tchaikovsky's 'Pathetic' Symphony and 'Casse-Noisette' suite, the overture to 'Tannhäuser' and Grieg's 'Peer Gynt' (No. 1) suite. In the symphony and overture classes, Beethoven had second place with his C minor Symphony and 'Leonora' No. 3 overture; and as the voting generally shows a decided preference for established favourites, it was a compliment to Mr. Emil Mlynarski to have his new Symphony placed seventh on a list of eighteen. Mr. Morgan Kingston, as solo vocalist, contributed excerpts by Wagner and Coleridge-Taylor; and at the close of the concert Mr. Mlynarski—whose services as conductor have been secured for next season—and the Scottish Orchestra received the customary ovation.

GLOUCESTER AND DISTRICT.

The concert of the Gloucester Orpheus Society, always a popular annual fixture, was held on Thursday, February 9, in the Shire Hall, Gloucester, which has recently been enlarged and improved. The Society were in the best of form, and in spite of the fact that the programme contained items which demand choral technique of a very high order, their voices never showed the slightest sign of fatigue. Dr. A. Herbert Brewer, as conductor of the Society, has command of a body of vocal enthusiasts, and it was pleasing to see that their efforts were appreciated by a larger audience than had attended the Orpheus concerts for several years past.

The Gloucester Instrumental Society gave their fourth annual concert in the Shire Hall on Tuesday, February 14. The Society numbers sixty members, and is led by Mr. Joseph Woodward. The works chosen for this year's concert were Sullivan's 'Di Ballo' overture; Beethoven's fifth Symphony; Cowen's 'In Fairyland' Suite; and Grand Fantasia 'Cavalleria Rusticana.' The playing throughout was crisp and clean, and the whole performance was highly creditable.

LIVERPOOL AND DISTRICT.

The programme of the eighth Philharmonic Concert, on January 24, commenced with Beethoven's 'Fidelio' (No. 4) Overture, and terminated with Lalo's exhilarating 'Fête Foraine' from his suite 'Namouna' (No. 1). Dr. Cowen's 'Scandinavian' Symphony was heard with the personal interest which attaches to this clever and musically well when conducted by its composer. Brahms's Pianoforte concerto in D minor afforded an opportunity for Mr. Harold Bauer to display his fine mental and technical equipment as a pianist, and the artistic interest of the concert was also sustained by the singing of Miss Elena Gerhardt, especially in a group of songs by Hugo Wolf accompanied by Miss Paula Hegner. Max Bruch's semi-sacred part-song 'Morning song of Praise' was effectively sung by the choir, and recalled memories of its eminent composer, who at one time was the Society's resident conductor.

The concert performance of the third Act of 'Lohengrin,' given by the Philharmonic Society on February 7, was uninspiring, although it had the advantage of being conducted by Mr. Landon Ronald, and sung as regards the principal parts by Miss Perceval Allen (Elsa), Mr. Walter Hyde (Lohengrin), Mr. Radford (King Henry), and Miss Edina Thraves, a young local soprano, who sang courageously Ortrud's brief and agitated lines.

To the Schiever Quartet is chiefly due the credit of providing occasional opportunities of hearing chamber-music worthy of the name, and on January 21, in the Rushworth Hall, Mr. Ernst Schiever and his able associates, Messrs. Alfred Ross, T. Rimmer, and Walter Hatton, were heard in Smetana's quartet 'Aus meinem Leben' and Brahms's Pianoforte quintet in A, Op. 26, in which the strings were joined by Mr. F. Dawson.

Under the direction of Dr. C. T. Reynolds, a performance of Sullivan's 'Light of the World' was given with orchestral accompaniment by the Oxtown and Claughton Choral Society on January 21. The melodious and interesting work was happily chosen, and the performance realized its best qualities. The vocal principals were Miss Sara Silcock, Miss Hilda Cragg-James, Mr. Val Thompson, and Mr. George Platt. Another performance deserving note was that given of T. Mee-Pattison's Cantata 'The Ancient Mariner' on January 30, by the St. Anne's, Aigburth, Choral and Orchestral Society.

Mr. Thomas Beecham's orchestral concert in the Town Hall, St. Helen's, on January 24, was a great success. His father the Mayor, Alderman Beecham, had invited some nine hundred guests, and the concert was preceded by a reception. The vocalist was Miss Mignon Nevada, and the orchestral items included the 'Oberon' Overture, Liszt's Rhapsody No. 2, and other music brilliantly played under Mr. Beecham's direction.

The pianoforte recital given by de Pachmann on January 28 attracted a great audience. Another renowned player who has not visited Liverpool for ten years, Mr. Moriz Rosenthal, gave two pianoforte recitals on February 13, in the Rushworth Hall.

At the sixth concert of Mr. Vasco Akeroyd's Symphony Orchestra on January 31, Mr. A. Von Ahn Carse conducted a performance of his Symphony No. 2, in G minor, a clever work whose interest and merits lie chiefly in other directions than symphonic.

The Liscard Orchestral Society, an excellent organization chiefly of amateur composition, carried out an attractive programme under the direction of Mr. Philip Smart at their concert on February 4. Mr. James E. Brien (baritone) and Mr. Stanley Redfern (flautist) contributed solos. Another interesting local event was the first public appearance as a vocalist of Miss Evelyn Francis, a pupil of Sir Charles Santley, which took place with success on February 6. Mr. Frank Bertrand played pianoforte solos and Mr. Stanley Prescott accompanied.

At the 152nd concert of the Societa Armonica on February 11, Mr. Vasco Akeroyd conducted a satisfactory performance of Dvorák's Symphony, 'From the New World,' and Miss Dorothy Ravenscroft, one of the Orchestra's first violins, played with facility in Bruch's G minor Violin concerto. The vocalist was Miss Hilda Cragg-James.

Two young native artists, Miss Gertrude Blomfield (soprano) and Mr. Marmaduke Barton (pianist) appeared with success at the seventh concert of the Symphony Orchestra on February 14, when Mr. Barton displayed exceptional powers in the solo part of Schumann's Pianoforte concerto.

The City Education Committee have sanctioned the appointment and payment of teachers for eighteen musical exhibitions, the arrangement having become necessary because the Liverpool College of Music, at which the scholarships were tenable, has ceased to be a teaching institution. A new member of the committee expressed surprise and indignation at the proposal to ask the ratepayers for £10 10s. a term in respect of two violoncello students, one cornet, one clarinet and one French-horn student. This, in his opinion, was education gone mad. It is satisfactory to hear that the majority of the committee did not entertain his views, nor indeed will the public generally. It was stated that a return of former students of instrumental music was a remarkable one. Previous holders of Liverpool studentships were in some cases conducting orchestras in various parts of the country, and otherwise occupying places formerly held by foreigners. It would be easy for the committee to expend public money in less useful and profitable directions.

MANCHESTER AND DISTRICT.

The outstanding features in the musical life of the closing days of January and the first half of February have been the visits of Gerhardt, Godowsky, and Professor Granville Bantock, who, on January 26, conducted Parts 2 and 3 of 'Omar Khayyâm.' The composer had enjoyed somewhat exceptional facilities advantageous to its preparation. Mr. Frederic Austin gave a wonderful reading of the part of the Philosopher; and Miss Phyllis Lett and Mr. John Coates were worthy associates. The Hallé Choir achieved results of a kind which before they have never even approached, the composer leading them with such complete assurance as to remove many anticipatory anxieties.

Godowsky revealed many sides of his wonderful art in the course of two days at the Gentlemen's and Hallé Concerts on February 1 and 2. In the evening we passed to Elena Gerhardt's recital of Brahms, Schumann, and Wolf lieder at the third Harrison Concert. How rarely in one day can two such incomparable artists be heard!

At the Hallé Concert of February 9 the most prominent position in the programme was accorded to Goldmark's undistinguished E flat Symphony, dating from 1887.

Dukas's 'L'apprenti sorcier' was handled by Dr. Richter in rather Eulenspiegelish fashion, but its reception was second only in warmth to that awarded to the Bach Double Concerto for two violins, played by Dr. Brodsky and Mr. Arthur Catterall, which was last played here thirteen years ago (under Dr. Cowen).

'Elijah,' on February 16, brought the season to its last lap, and with the B minor Mass and a Wagner evening already fixed, this will only allow three concerts for the inclusion of novelties announced at the beginning of the season, but from various reasons deferred.

At Alderley Edge, in Cheshire, but in the Manchester 'sphere of influence,' the Vicar of Chelford, the Rev. Colin E. Bell, conducts the Choral Society, utilizing members of the Hallé band. The choir is only eighty strong, so can but work on a modest scale with compositions like Gaul's 'Holy City' and Mendelssohn's 'Hear my prayer,' which were sung on February 8, the Sandbach Philharmonic Society singing the last-named work on the same evening.

At two recent concerts given by Mr. Brand Lane, his Philharmonic Choir sang two of Stanford's Elizabethan Pastorals, and a similar style of eclogue by Sir Hubert Parry 'Tell me, O love,' the choice probably being influenced by the presence on January 28 of Sir C. V. Stanford, who accompanied Mr. Plunket Greene in twenty-two songs, including the 'Cushendall' cycle.

At the 245th Salford municipal concert, given in the Royal Technical Institute on January 28, where the charges are quite nominal, the Choral Society, directed by Mr. J. Pugh Lane, gave the first performance in this district of Walford Davies's 'Everyman.' The choir is only fairly balanced in numbers, but animated by considerable intelligence, and much of the dramatic point of the old Morality play was brought out. The soloists, all of local repute, were Madame Annie Radford, Miss Gertrude Taylor, Mr. Albert J. Holt and Mr. Hamilton Harris, among whom the last-named stood out prominently. There is a fine work going on here in the best propagandist spirit, and all concerned deserve encouragement to still higher attainments.

The Musical Society continues, at its series of weekly meetings, to bring forward unknown or little-known chamber-music, which otherwise would secure no recognition. The lecture habit is steadily growing here; following the lead of the Ancoats gatherings, where Mr. Surette has been engaged, Mr. Albert J. Cross, principal of the Manchester School of Music, secured Mr. Newman for two lectures, the one on 'Folk-song and modern music' being of great interest.

Early in February, Mr. Joseph Bonnet, from St. Eustache, Paris, gave important organ recitals at the New Albert Hall, and also at the University.

Another notable development has been started at the Cathedral, where, at 1.15 p.m. each Friday, Mr. Sydney H. Nicholson gives a brief recital. Friday is one of Manchester's market days in the cotton world, and the sight of 2,000 men snatching a brief half-hour during lunch time to hear good organ-music before going on 'Change at 2 o'clock must be ample compensation to the Cathedral authorities.

NEWCASTLE AND DISTRICT.

As we have few opportunities of hearing chamber music by native composers, the insertion of a delightful and well-written 'Phantasy' by Frank Bridge at the Chamber Music Society's concert on January 24 was a welcome innovation. It was played by the English String Quartet, of which the composer is a member.

Miss Elena Gerhardt again created an enormous impression by her superb Lieder singing at the Harrison concert on February 7, and Miss Paula Hegner made an admirable accompanist and a brilliant soloist.

Much interest was caused by the reappearance of Mr. J. Friskin at one of the concerts of the Newcastle Musical Society on February 1. The composer was joined by Mr. Alfred Wall in the performance of a Pianoforte and Violin sonata, which, while exhibiting much cleverness and constructive ability, rarely rose to more than academic interest.

NOTTINGHAM AND DISTRICT.

A fine performance of 'Elijah' was given on February 1 by the Gainsborough Choral Society, which is celebrating its fiftieth year of work. The choir and orchestra of 150 members was ably conducted by Mr. Montgomery, and the solos were artistically sung by Miss Marie Houghton, Miss Gwladys Roberts, Mr. Ivor Walters, and Mr. Joseph Lycett.

On February 9 the Nottingham Sacred Harmonic Society gave the third Act of 'Lohengrin' and the third Act of 'Tannhäuser,' introducing the chorus 'Hail, bright abode' and the overture of the latter work. The chorus-singing was at times of a high order, but the special feature was the playing of the orchestra.

The solos were entrusted to Madame de Vere Sapio, Miss Dorothy Wiley, Mr. John Coates and Mr. Harry Dearth, whose dramatic work raised the performance to a high level. Mr. Allen Gill conducted, and Mr. Lyell Tayler was leader.

SHEFFIELD AND DISTRICT.

There was a larger audience than usual at the third orchestral Promenade Concert, attracted doubtless by the performance of Tchaikovsky's two most popular works—the 'Pathetic' Symphony and the B flat minor Pianoforte concerto. Seeing that fifty of the sixty instrumentalists were local players, having but few opportunities for playing together in works of such calibre, their performances were excellent. They entered into the varying moods of the Symphony, making it significant and picturesque, while in the Concerto they accompanied with restraint and sympathy. The pianist was Mr. Cecil Baumer. Mr. J. A. Rodgers conducted.

The Chesterfield Musical Union, for a comparatively new organization, has made surprising progress in a district which hitherto has not been particularly noted for its choral achievements. Possibly the talent was latent, only needing development. If so, the district has 'arrived' so thoroughly that the Society has been able to encompass a well-studied and highly creditable performance of Brahms's 'Requiem' and Cliffe's 'Ode to the north-east wind.' Mr. J. F. Staton, the conductor, has wonderfully improved the technique of his choir, which, however, is at present disproportionately balanced.

Smaller choral performances of notable merit given during the past month were those of Mendelssohn's 'St. Paul' by the St. Barnabas Choral Society, under Mr. M. Bruster, and Haydn's 'The Creation,' by a smartly trained suburban choral society at St. John's (Abbeydale), conducted by Mr. G. A. Seed. The Aston and District Choral Society, directed by Mr. T. Pinder, also gave a performance of Sterndale Bennett's 'The May Queen.'

LEEDS.

During the past month several Yorkshire towns have been favoured by the meteoric visits of Melba and Sousa, whose concerts are of too well-recognized a type to call for criticism or description. At Leeds, two of the Municipal Orchestral Concerts have taken place. On January 28, a 'cycle' of seven of Wagner's overtures, from 'Rienzi' to 'Parsifal,' attracted the largest audience of the season to the Town Hall. Mr. Alexander Cohen played both of Beethoven's Violin Romances in artistic style, and the vocalist was Miss Alys Bateman. On February 11, variety was added to the concert by the appearance, under Mr. J. W. Armitage, of the Huddersfield Glee and Madrigal Society, which gave some refined interpretations of old English madrigals. Mr. A. E. Grimshaw conducted his genial comedy-overture, 'The golden wedding,' which was written last year as prelude to a little folk-song play by Mr. F. Kidson, and is based on old Yorkshire folk-tunes. Granville Bantock's 'Old English' Suite and the first part of d'Indy's 'Wallenstein' made up an attractive programme. Mr. Fricker conducted both these concerts. Some enjoyable chamber concerts have been given by local musicians. On January 25, the Leeds Bohemian Quartet gave string quartets by Haydn, Smetana ('Aus meinem Leben'), and Brahms (in B flat); on February 8, the Rasch Quartet, with the co-operation of a second violinist, played Beethoven's String quintet in C, and Brahms's second String quintet in G, both works of exceptional power, which were finely rendered. On February 15, the Leeds Trio introduced Tchaikovsky's great Trio in A minor, Beethoven's Clarinet trio in B flat, and Chausson's Pianoforte quartet in A (Op. 30); and finally, on February 18, Miss Alice Simpkin's Ladies' Quartet gave string quartets by Beethoven, Dvorák, and Dohnányi, the last a Quartet in D flat (Op. 15) which had not before been heard at Leeds. On January 24, the Harehills Orchestral Society, a recently instituted amateur orchestra, gave, under Mr. Turton's direction, a programme that included Mozart's 'Paris' Symphony and the 'Casse Noisette' Suite, which were quite creditably performed. On February 1, the Leeds New Choral Society, which also owns Mr. Turton as its artistic head, gave Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha' trilogy with fair success, the soloists being Miss Norah Moon, Mr. Monaghan, and Mr. George Parker. The Leeds Parish Choir's annual concert, on the following evening, was of the accustomed type, but was distinguished by the inclusion of a very able and interesting 'Air and variations' for two pianofortes, which was brilliantly played by Dr. Bairstow, the composer, and his pupil, Mr. Ernest Bullock.

BRADFORD.

At the Bradford Subscription Concerts on February 3 and 17, an opportunity for an interesting comparison was afforded by the appearance of two such distinguished, and strongly contrasted, singers as Madame Melba and Miss Elena Gerhardt. On February 10, the Bradford Festival Choral Society gave Mr. Hubert Bath's clever cantata, 'The wedding of Shon Maclean,' which received quite a brilliant interpretation under Mr. Fricker, the chorus-master of the Society, who, owing to Dr. Cowen's regrettable illness, had to conduct the concert. A novelty was introduced to the programme in the shape of a short work by a gifted lady musician of the district, Miss Claiborne Dixon. This was a setting, for chorus, quartet of soloists, and string orchestra, of 'Four love complaints' by Sir Thomas Wyatt, the music of which shows considerable musicianship, and, especially in a contralto solo, very expressively sung by Miss Elsie Bradley, a nice, refined feeling, while the essentially English flavour is quite in keeping with the quaint words. The free chamber concerts organized by Mr. S. Midgley, the first of which I chronicled last month, have been continued, on January 23, February 17 and 20, with an ever-growing popularity, hundreds having been turned away from the doors. The programmes have included such works as Max Bruch's Pianoforte trio in C minor, Schumann's Pianoforte quintet, String quartets by Mendelssohn and Dvorák, and Pianoforte trios by Beethoven (in E flat) and Arensky (D minor), so that the high standard has been well maintained. On February 1, Mr. Isidor Cohn gave a pianoforte recital in commemoration of the twenty-fifth anniversary of his first concert at Bradford, a town with which he has been associated ever since as an accomplished pianist and successful teacher. In the programme of the Bradford Permanent Orchestra's concert on February 13, the chief things were the 'Karelia' Suite of Sibelius, Mr. Hamish MacCunn's graceful overture, 'Land of the mountain and the flood,' and Mendelssohn's 'Capriccio brillante' for pianoforte and orchestra, in which the soloist was Miss Ida Bellerby, a promising young pianist.

OTHER TOWNS.

The Wakefield Chamber Concert on February 2 was of more than average interest. The Walenn String Quartet were heard in Dr. Walford Davies's dainty 'Peter Pan' Suite, and, with Mr. Alfred Hobday as pianist, gave a fine, spirited performance of Brahms's F minor Quintet. Mrs. Hobday also introduced two romantic Rhapsodies by Dohnányi, the character of which she brought out admirably. A very enjoyable subscription concert was given at Malton on February 9 by Miss Agnes Nicholls and Mr. Tivadar Nachez, with Mr. Hamilton Harty at the pianoforte. Some charming songs from Mr. Harty's 'Songs of Ireland' and Mr. Graham Peel's 'Country Lover' cycle, and a group of little-known pieces from the compositions of old-world violinists like Tartini, Barbella, Exaudet, and Leclair were among the more striking features in a programme which was anything but hackneyed. On January 24, the Hull Vocal Society, under Dr. G. H. Smith, gave a miscellaneous concert, including unaccompanied choral music; and on January 25, the Cleckheaton Orchestral Society, under Mr. Stott's direction, gave a programme of which Weber's 'Concertstück,' with Miss Margolies as soloist, was the central feature.

Foreign Notes.

AMSTERDAM.

Two rarely-heard operas, Haydn's 'Der Apotheker' and Schubert's 'Der häusliche Krieg' ('Die Verschworenen'), were revived at the Royal Opera House on January 24.

BERLIN.

The first European performance of Humperdinck's new fairy-tale opera 'Die KönigsKinder' took place on January 14 at the Royal Opera House.—An interesting programme, including Berlioz's Symphony 'Harold en Italie,' Delius's English Rhapsody 'Brigg Fair' and a Symphonie concertante for viola d'amour, double-bass and orchestra, by Bernhard Lorenziti (soloists, Messrs. Henri Casadesus and Sergius Koussevitsky), was given at the sixth Philharmonic Concert conducted by Professor Arthur Nikisch.—On January 17, the violinist Professor Henri Marteau gave the first of a series of six concerts devoted to the performance of violin concertos with orchestra. The scheme includes concertos by Bach in E major and A minor, five by Mozart, and examples by Brahms, Dubois, Sinding (Op. 45), Jaques-Dalcroze, Dvorák, Joseph Lauber, Max Bruch, Gernsheim, Leander Schegel, Mendelssohn and Beethoven.—At the Philharmonic concert a performance of the first act of Hans Pfitzner's interesting opera 'Die Rose von Liebesgarten' was given. On the same occasion several numbers from Busoni's music to Gozzi's fairy-drama 'Turandot' were played. In this work the composer has succeeded in the attempt to produce an Oriental atmosphere.—At his recent recital the young Danish pianist Herr Carl Bernhard Philippsen introduced three pianoforte pieces (Op. 11) by Arnold Schönberg.—On January 20, Franz Neumann's opera 'Liebelei' was successfully given for the first time at the Komische Oper.—Under the conductorship of Herr Oscar Fried, Gustav Mahler's seventh Symphony was performed for the first time in Berlin at the sixth concert of the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde.—At the sixth Symphony Concert of the Königliche Kapelle a new orchestral phantasy, 'Vineta,' with obligato for harp, by Franz Poenitz, was produced under the direction of Dr. Richard Strauss.—On January 30, Max Reger's new Pianoforte concerto was played for the first time in Berlin by Madame Frieda Kwast-Hodapp at the sixth Philharmonic Concert (conductor, Herr Nikisch).—Alexander Ritter's interesting but rarely-performed symphonic poem, 'Kaiser Rudolf's Ritt zum Grabe,' was lately revived by Herr Siegmund von Hausegger.

The coming festival performances are to be conducted by Herr Siegfried Wagner, who will supervise the performance of 'Die Meistersinger'; Herr Balling, who will take charge of 'The Ring'; and Dr. Karl Muck, under whose bâton 'Parsifal' will be given.

BONN.

Hans Pfitzner's overture to Kleist's 'Kätchen von Heilbronn,' Friedrich Gernsheim's fourth Symphony, and a new Intermzzo for String orchestra, 'Schwarz-wälder Zwischenklänge,' by the talented composer Knud Harder, formed the programme of the fifth subscription Symphony Concert (conductor, Professor Grüters).—Reger's new Pianoforte quartet (Op. 113) was heard for the first time at the fourth chamber-music concert.

BRUSSELS.

On January 11, the opera 'La Glu,' composed by Gabriel Dupont to the libretto of Messrs. Jean Richepin and Henri Cain, was given for the first time with great success at the Théâtre Royal de la Monnaie. Debussy's opera 'Pelléas et Mélisande' again exercised its singular charm when revived at the same institution on January 19.—The first of three performances to be given of Richard Strauss's 'Elektra' took place at the same theatre on February 3. The work again held the audience with the same iron grip as when first produced.—An interesting programme of Russian music was played at the Concert Durant on January 29. It included the Symphony in E flat by Borodine, Rimsky-Korsakoff's Symphony in C major, and Pianoforte concerto in C sharp minor, as well as Liapounoff's new Pianoforte concerto in E flat (soloist, M. Ricardo Vines) and the orchestral legend 'Le lac enchanté,' by Liadoff.

BUDA-PEST.

The most interesting of recent musical events have been the visits of the composers Dr. Richard Strauss, M. Sergei Rachmaninoff, and M. Debussy. Strauss conducted two performances of his 'Elektra' at the National Theatre, and at a concert he played his incidental music to Tennyson's poem, 'Enoch Arden,' as well as the accompaniments for Madame Lulau Mysz-Gmeiner, who sang a number of his finest songs. Rachmaninoff presented his Violoncello sonata in G minor, a Pianoforte trio (D minor), and in a number of beautiful Preludes for pianoforte proved himself a fine executant. M. Debussy, whose individual artistic personality aroused great interest, played a number of his atmospheric pianoforte compositions. His String quartet in G minor had also an enthusiastic reception.—A new Hungarian opera, 'Frater Georg,' by Ferdinand Rékai, was successfully produced at the National Theatre.

DRESDEN.

Julius Bittner's opera 'Der Musikant' was lately given for the first time at the Royal Opera, and was well received.—The Königliche Kapelle devoted one of its recent Symphony Concerts to modern French music, the programme including Saint-Saëns's third Symphony in C minor, the symphonic-poem 'Le chasseur maudit,' by César Franck, and Debussy's two orchestral nocturnes 'Nuages' and 'Fêtes,' both of which were coldly received. At another concert, M. Sergei Rachmaninoff obtained a great success with the performance of his new Pianoforte concerto (No. 3, in D minor).—The event of the season took place on January 26, when Richard Strauss's new comic opera 'Der Rosenkavalier' was produced at the Royal Opera. This is dealt with in another column.

EISLEBEN.

Under the conductorship of Dr. Hermann Stephan, Handel's oratorio 'Jephtha' was given on January 10. It is understood that this was the first performance in Germany.

FRANKFORT-ON-THE-MAIN.

At the sixth concert of the Museumsgesellschaft Dr. Richard Strauss conducted his 'Symphonia Domestica' and 'Till Eulenspiegel,' and Herr Max Reger played the Pianoforte part of his Quartet, Op. 113. Herr Mengelberg has conducted performances of Debussy's finely-coloured orchestral sketch 'La mer' and Elgar's Violin concerto (soloist, Herr Kreisler).

HAMBURG.

The new second Symphony by Hermann Bischoff was recently produced with much success under the direction of Herr Siegmund von Hausegger.

LEIPSIK.

Paul Dukas's orchestral Scherzo, 'L'apprenti sorcier,' figured for the first time in the programme of the eleventh Gewandhaus concert (conductor, Professor Arthur Nikisch).—At the Neues Theatre, Franz Neumann's opera 'Liebelei' was given for the first time.—Jean Sibelius's interesting String quartet, 'Voces intime,' Op. 56, was heard for the first time at the concert of the Sevcik Quartet.—At the seventh Philharmonic Concert, Professor Hans Winder-stein introduced Ewald Strässer's Symphony in G major and Elgar's March 'Pomp and Circumstance,' No. 2, which was a popular success.—Vincent d'Indy's symphonic-poem 'Istar' and César Franck's 'Les Djinns' for pianoforte and orchestra (soloist, M. Raoul Pugno) were played for the first time in Leipzig at the fourteenth Gewandhaus concert.—Stephan Krehl's new concerto for Violoncello and 'Orchestra in G minor, Op. 37, was produced with considerable success at the fifteenth Gewandhaus concert.

MUNICH.

At the Royal Opera, Herr Felix Mottl has supervised carefully-prepared revivals of Bellini's 'Norma' and Peter Cornelius's 'Der Cid.'—At the Academy Concerts Professor Schmid-Lindner played Reger's new Pianoforte concerto for the first time.—Much interest was aroused by the concert of compositions by Herr Arnold Schönberg.

NURNBERG.

Dr. Richard Strauss's new comic opera 'Der Rosenkavalier' was given with great success at the Municipal Theatre two days after the production of the work at Dresden.

PARIS.

Gabriel Pierné's interesting 'Poème Symphonique' for pianoforte and orchestra (soloist, M. Eduard Risler) was included in the programme of the Colonne Concert on January 8. At the following concert one of the most interesting items was Liszt's symphonic poem, 'Ce qu'on entend sur la montagne.' On January 22 Mahler's fifth Symphony was performed for the first time in Paris at the Lamoureux Concert (conductor, M. Camille Chevillard). The 'drame lyrique,' 'L'Acécêtre,' composed by M. Saint-Saëns to the libretto of M. Auge de Lassus, was given at the Opéra-Comique on January 23 for the first time in Paris. This interesting work has previously been played at Monte Carlo.

On January 22 Handel's 'Israel in Egypt' appeared for the first time on the programme of the Société des Concerts de la Conservatoire.

PRAGUE.

Humperdinck's new opera 'Die Königskinder' achieved a great success when recently performed for the first time at the Deutsche Landestheatre.

STRASSBURG.

On January 8, Hans Pfitzner's opera 'Der arme Heinrich' was given for the first time at the Stadttheatre, and was well received. The composer has since been honoured with the Degree of Doctor by the Philosophical Faculty of the Strassburg University.

VIENNA.

Johann Strauss's operetta 'Der Zigeunerbaron' has been included in the repertoire of the Imperial Court Opera. Under the direction of Herr Weingartner the work achieved a great popular and artistic success. Herr Weingartner recently introduced Sinigaglia's overture 'Il Baruffe Chiozzote' and his Etude 'Caprice for String orchestra, both of which were heard with pleasure. On January 26, the opera 'Kapitan Fracasso,' by Mario Costo, was successfully produced at the Volksoper. The work has excellent points, but nothing that promises long life.

WIESBADEN.

At the third Cyklus Concert Eugène d'Harcourt's 'Symphonie Neo-classique' was very cordially received. Siegfried Karg-Elert's finely laid-out Pianoforte sonata in F sharp minor, Op. 50, was played at an interesting recital given by Miss Anna von Gabain. Weingartner's new Symphony in E major (No. 3) was recently given under the composer's baton for the first time in Germany.—On February 2, Humperdinck's 'Die Königskinder' was given for the first time at the Municipal Theatre, with great success.

BRIEFLY SUMMARIZED.

We cannot hold ourselves responsible for the opinions expressed in this summary, as the notices are either prepared from local newspapers or furnished by correspondents.
Correspondents are particularly requested to enclose a programme when forwarding reports of concerts.

BARNSTABLE.—A sacred cantata, 'The Epiphany,' by Dr. H. J. Edwards, was sung at the Parish Church on February 9, with the aid of members of the Musical Festival Society. The solo parts were taken by Mrs. A. T. Long, Miss Knill, Mr. Northcote and Messrs. Sydney Harper, sen. and jun. The composer was at the organ.

BELPER.—An excellent performance of Van Bree's 'St. Cecilia's Day' was the feature of the concert given under the direction of Mr. John B. Gough on January 25. The soprano soloist was Miss Bernice N. Woods. The choir also sang Cooke's 'Strike the lyre' and Schumann's 'Gipsy life.'

BRIGHTON.—The Sacred Harmonic Society gave their second performance of Elgar's 'The Dream of Gerontius' on February 9, under the direction of Mr. Robert Taylor. Their first performance was given under the composer's direction at the Brighton Festival two years ago. On this occasion the choir showed an increased command of the technical and expressive requirements of the work, and in every way their singing reached a very high standard. The opposing moods of the demoniac and devotional choruses were represented with equal success. The solo music was admirably sung by Miss M. H. Palgrave-Turner, Mr. Henry Turpenney and Mr. Joseph Farrington. Mr. Percy C. Taylor was at the organ.

BROMLEY.—The Choral Society gave a performance of Mendelssohn's 'St. Paul' on January 25, at Bromley Parish Church, before a crowded congregation. The band and chorus numbered 120, and the soloists were Miss Townena Thomas, Miss May Doubleday, Mr. Herbert Thompson and Mr. Jamieson Dodd. Mr. Percy Hodsoll presided at the organ and the conductor was Mr. Frederic Fertel.

CHARD.—Gade's 'Zion' and Cowen's 'John Gilpin' were performed by the Chard Harmonic Society on February 9, under the direction of Mr. F. G. Risdon. The choir sang effectively and was supported by an efficient small orchestra. The soloists were Miss Gertrude Winchester and Mr. Libbis N. Burch.

CLYDACH, N.B.—On January 8 the Male-voice Choir gave a highly successful performance of Félicien David's 'The Desert,' before a large audience at the Baptist Chapel. This was their first performance of a work of importance, and it speaks well for the singers that their first attempt at this class of work was attended by such satisfactory results. The speaking part was taken by Mr. D. Clydach Thomas and the tenor music sung by Mr. Sam Hemsall.

DISS.—An excellent performance of 'Elijah' was given by the Choral Society under the able direction of Mr. T. M. Pullen, on January 24. Both chorus and soloists earned the applause of a large audience. The chief of the latter were Miss Marion Perrott, Miss Lily Gover, Mr. Samuel Masters and Mr. Graham Smart. An efficient orchestra was led by Mr. T. E. Gatehouse, assisted by Mr. C. W. Willford at the pianoforte and Mr. Hemstock at the organ.

DUNFERMLINE.—Under the auspices of the Carnegie Dunfermline Trust the Operatic Choir of that name, assisted by the Scottish Orchestra and four capable soloists, gave a very successful concert in St. Margaret's Hall on February 9. The first part of the programme consisted of well-chosen selections from 'Lohengrin,' while the second part was miscellaneous and included Elgar's 'Go, song of mine,' and Parry's 'Blest pair of Sirens.' The soloists were Miss Perceval Allen, Mr. Henry Brearley, Mr. Herbert Brown and Mr. Robert Watson. Mr. David Stephen, director of music to the Trust, conducted.

ELGIN.—On February 8, the local Choral and Orchestral Society gave a performance of Van Bree's 'St. Cecilia's Day,' and a miscellaneous second part consisting of part-songs, vocal solos, and orchestral pieces, under Mr. John Barnett. The choir gave evidence of efficient training and musical appreciation. The soloists were Miss M. Norman Snowball and Mr. Philip Malcolm. The part-songs were 'The river floweth strong, my love' (Roland Rogers), 'The dawn of song' (Bairdston) and 'The miller's wooing' (Faning). The orchestra played Coleridge-Taylor's 'Novellette' No. 2, and a 'Sarabande and Bourrée' by Bach.

FARNHAM.—A satisfactory performance of Haydn's 'The Creation' was given by the Musical Society at the Corn Exchange on February 7, under the direction of Mr. Percy R. Rowe. Some of the choral singing was characterized by great vitality. The soloists were Miss Doris Simpson, Mr. Frank Webster and Mr. Herbert Marks. Mr. W. Marks was at the organ.

HARTLEY WINTNEY.—Goring Thomas's 'The Sun-worshippers' and Cowen's 'John Gilpin' were given by the Choral Society on January 25, under the direction of Mr. Hammett Drake. An orchestra contributed towards the efficiency of the performances. The soloists were Madame Gertrude Inglis and Mr. Claude Goodchild. During the concert a floral tribute was paid to Mrs. Eggar, the Society's secretary.

KELVEDON, ESSEX.—An excellent performance of Smart's cantata 'The bride of Dunkerron' was given by the Musical Society on January 25. The solo parts were excellently sung by Miss Eva Hart (soprano), Mr. Alex. Webster (tenor), and Mr. Graham Smart (bass).

LEWES.—The Musical Society added financial success to their usual artistic success in giving their performance of 'Judas Maccabæus' on February 8. The chorus and full orchestra of 130 were conducted by Mr. Horace Jackson, and the solo parts were taken by Miss Muriel Berry, Miss Annie Fox, Mr. Frank Webster and Mr. W. Harold Larwill.

LOUTH.—The Choral Society gave a concert in the Town Hall on Thursday, January 26, when the opening section of the programme consisted of Parts 1 and 2 of Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha,' which were excellently sung under the direction of Mr. Owen M. Price. Mr. John Booth, Madame Hilda Petty and Mr. G. H. Clark were the soloists. The second half of the programme was of a miscellaneous character, concluding with the chorus 'It comes from the misty ages' from Elgar's 'The Banner of St. George.'

LIVERSEDGE.—On February 12, Mendelssohn's 95th Psalm and Mozart's motet 'Glory, honour, praise and power' were sung by the choir of Hightown Wesleyan Chapel, Liversedge, under the direction of Mr. Frank Sharp. The soloists were Miss Jennie Halmshaw and Mr. Wilfred Hudson. Mr. Arthur Firth presided at the organ. His recital programme included the tone-poem 'Finlandia' (Sibelius), part of the 'Peer Gynt' Suite (Grieg) and the Pastorale from Guilmant's Sonata in D minor.

LYTTELTON, N.Z.—The Musical Union gave their annual performance of 'The Messiah' on December 13 at His Majesty's Theatre. The choir, which is a highly capable organization, sang with precision and excellent effect under the direction of Dr. Bradshaw. The solo parts were taken by Mrs. Gower Burns, Mrs. Ernest Firth, Mr. R. Vincent, and Mr. G. Marsh.

MELBOURNE.—The sixteenth session of the Conservatorium of Music in the University of Melbourne was brought to a close by a concert in the Town Hall in the presence of a very large audience. The programme contained movements from Pianoforte concertos by Beethoven, Schumann and Brahms; Violin concertos by Mendelssohn and Max Bruch; and songs by Thomas and Saint-Saëns, all accompanied by full orchestra.

NEWCASTLE, STAFFS.—A highly attractive concert was given on February 16 by the Male-Voice Glee Union under the direction of Mr. S. E. Lovatt. The programme, which was ably carried out by the choir of fifty voices, included Elgar's 'After many a dusty mile,' MacDowell's 'As the gloaming shadows,' T. Cooke's 'Hohenlinden,' and Mr. Lovatt's 'Nursery rhymes.' Solos were sung by Miss Ada Forrest and Mr. W. Sweetman.

RETTFORD.—The Choral Society, ably conducted by Mr. H. C. Andrews, gave an interesting concert on February 17. The chief work performed was Stanford's 'The Revenge.' There was also a miscellaneous section in which some excellent unaccompanied part-singing was heard. An efficient orchestra assisted.

RHOSLANERCHRUGOG, NORTH WALES.—An excellent performance of Mozart's 'Twelfth Mass' was given at the Bethlehem Congregational Church on February 15, by the Bethlehem United Choral Society. The soloists were Madame Laura Evans-Williams, Madame Annie Hargreaves, Mr. Cynlais Gibbs and Mr. John Powell. Edwards. The choir, numbering 110 voices, was accompanied by the organ and a brass quintet. Mr. Dan Roberts conducted and Mr. Caradoc Roberts was at the organ.

SALTBUEN.—An interesting programme was carried out successfully by the Choral Society on February 2, under the direction of Mr. W. H. Boynes. The choir took part in 'Hiawatha's Wedding-feast,' Fanning's 'Moonlight,' Boughton's 'Choral Variations,' and Cowen's 'Bridal chorus.' Solos were sung by Miss Joan Borradaile and Mr. John Collett.

SITTINGBOURNE.—A highly creditable performance of Gade's picturesque cantata 'The Crusaders' was given at the Town Hall on January 25. The chorus and orchestra of eighty responded well to the able direction of Mr. W. J. Keech. The soloists were Miss Florence Macnaughton, Mr. Malcolm Boyle and Mr. Arthur Barlow.

SOUTHPORT.—An impressive interpretation of Gounod's 'Messe Solonelle' was given with orchestral accompaniments at St. Luke's Church on February 19, under the direction of Mr. J. C. Clarke. At the conclusion of the service Elgar's 'Sursum Corda' was played with organ, strings and brass. Mr. E. P. Beaumont was the organist.

STOURBRIDGE.—The Concert Society performed Dvorák's 'Te Deum' and a selection from 'The Messiah' on January 23. The choir observed due dramatic emphasis in the former work, and sang with intelligence and good tone throughout. Solo parts were taken by Madame Alice Phillips, Miss Emily Rudge, and Mr. Harry Downing. The orchestra played Beethoven's 'Pastoral Symphony.' Mr. Halford conducted.

TREHARRIS.—An excellent performance of 'The Messiah' was given on February 2 by the Choral Society, under the direction of Mr. W. J. R. Davis. The singing of the choir and soloists was of a high order and was much appreciated.

TROUBRIDGE.—The Philharmonic Society gave their first concert of the season at the Town Hall on January 24, under the direction of Mr. C. T. Weigall, organist of the Parish Church. The chief items were Mendelssohn's 'Loreley,' in which the solo part was taken by Miss Pauline Allen, and Bridge's 'The Inchcape Rock.' Highly creditable performances were given, to the merits of which an orchestra contributed.

VENTNOR.—The excellent Musical Society conducted by Mr. Evan Jones performed Sterndale Bennett's 'The Woman of Samaria' and Bach's 'My spirit was in heaviness' at the Town Hall on January 25, and did adequate justice to both works. The soloists were Miss Betty Hyde, Miss Mabel Corran, and Mr. Percy Heming. An orchestra assisted.

WELLINGTON (N.Z.).—To the Wellington Musical Union and its conductor, Mr. Robert Parker, is due the credit of what may be justly called the first public performance of Bach's 'St. Matthew' Passion in the Dominion of New Zealand. In the Wellington Town Hall, on December 1, 1910, the work as abridged for use in St. Paul's Cathedral was given an impressive performance by a choir of two hundred voices, accompanied by an orchestra of strings, and the splendid organ of Messrs. Norman & Beard played by Mr. A. W. Vine. The very trying part of the Narrator was artistically sung by Dr. W. Kingston Fyffe; the other principal soloists being Miss Gladys Watkins, Miss May Driscoll, and Mr. C. Clarkson, all of whom were thoroughly satisfactory in their respective parts. There was a very large audience. Altogether this was a landmark in the history of music in New Zealand.

TORONTO.—The greatest success of the season to date was scored by the National Chorus of Toronto on January 19, when they gave a programme consisting entirely of unaccompanied singing. From a technical standpoint the work done far eclipses anything ever attempted by the National Chorus, which may now fairly be said to have won a place among the finest singing organizations on the Continent—a well-balanced choir of fresh, enthusiastic singers, who know how to phrase and enunciate, firm and sure in attack and in adherence to pitch, and ready to respond to every wish of the conductor. Dr. Ham is to be sincerely congratulated on the beautiful singing of his choir, especially in the sacred works, 'Send out Thy light,' by Gounod, and Mendelssohn's setting of 'Why rage fiercely the heathen' for double choir. In Bortnianski's 'Cherubim Song' many beautiful ethereal effects were obtained by means of a boys' choir of some forty voices. Excellent work was also done in Max Bruch's 'Morning Song of Praise,' Wendt's 'Ballad of Spring,' Willan's 'My little pretty one,' and Forrester's 'Call of the breeze.' On Tuesday, January 24, the National Chorus repeated its concert in Brantford before a large and enthusiastic audience. Early in April they will co-operate in a patriotic concert with the Sheffield Choir on the occasion of their second visit to Toronto.

WINDSOR.—An interesting programme was selected by Mr. Thomas F. Dunhill for the concert which he organized at the Royal Albert Institute on February 8. The principal musical item in the miscellaneous section was Mrs. Alice Verne-Bredt's Phantasia Trio, played by Miss Marjorie Clemens, Miss May Mukle and Mr. Dunhill. Others who took part were Miss Marie Chinchin, Miss Edith Clegg and the Rev. Bernard Everett (vocalists).

WITHAM, ESSEX.—For their first concert of the season, the Musical Society gave Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha's Wedding-feast' and 'Death of Minnehaha' on February 1. The solos were sung by Miss Violet Stevens (soprano), Mr. William Doe (tenor), and Mr. W. Chalk (bass), and all of them proved highly successful. The choir, as usual, sang splendidly, attack and tone being alike excellent. Mr. N. Linley Howlett conducted, Miss G. Sewell led a very efficient orchestra, and Miss Dorothy Edwards accompanied.

Mr. Gervase Elwes met with a pleasant and perhaps unique experience towards the end of last year. The occasion was a performance of 'The dream of Gerontius' by the Catholic Philharmonic Society of Liverpool and Manchester. The choir had previously found out that this would be Mr. Elwes's 'jubilee of the work'—in other words, his fiftieth interpretation of the part of Gerontius. In the interval of the concert he was summoned by the conductor, Mr. Allen, into a reception-room, and presented with an address, signed by all the members of the choir, and a beautifully bound edition of the poem.

Answers to Correspondents.

M.H.—The expression 'the normal scale' is applied to the scale of C as the type of all the other scales. The suspended seventh is the seventh resolving upon the root of a first inversion of a common chord.

VOLGA.—We have not been able to trace the publication to which you refer.

CONCORD.—The way to a position as organist and piano-forte accompanist is a difficult one. You would realize this after you had gone through a professional course at one of the great schools. Enquire in your own town.

TORONTO.—Your plan of taking your male alto pupil through the classic Cathedral Anthems is distinctly a good one.

Other answers are held over, or have been given privately.

"Gounod's 'Redemption' appeals to the public largely on account of the words with which the music is associated, and the same can certainly be said of 'The Messiah.' In each case the music, however, is undoubtedly a powerful factor, and the words being not only impressive, but also familiar, the listener is doubly affected. . . . Then, to speak only of Gounod's work, it is strong because it is sincere. A gifted composer, by thoughtful and deep study of the sacred story, can illustrate it in tones effectively, but more convincingly if in true sympathy with the subject—in other words, if he be religious, using that term in its widest sense. And Gounod, like Bach, and in modern times Liszt, was of a serious cast of mind, and possessor, moreover, of a strongly emotional nature."—Daily Telegraph, March 1, 1909.

"If allowances are made for the state of popular musical thought in his day, and for the undoubted sincerity with which Gounod adopted a style that suited his nature, it is possible to consider his 'Redemption' in many respects a work of high art. Melody in itself, if dissociated from unsuitable surroundings, will never fail to appeal, and broad choral effect, when secured by skilful methods, will always give pleasure. The audience that gathered on Saturday evening to hear the 'Redemption' performed by the Alexandra Palace Choral Society, under the direction of Mr. Allen Gill, showed by their number and their interested attention that the work still retains its hold."—Morning Post, March 1, 1909.

ALFRED R. GAUL'S PASSION SERVICE

FOR THE SEASON OF

LENT AND GOOD FRIDAY.

"Scholarly writing, combined with unmistakable talent, and eminently adapted to the purpose for which it was written and composed. The work will probably be largely used, and Mr. Gaul has to be congratulated upon another success."—Sheffield Independent.
"The course of sacred events connected with the Passion is laid out by the writer so as to form a series of six distinct 'scenes.' The subjects of these divisions, each occupied with a particular stage of the Mystery, are, respectively: 'The Traitor at the Table,' 'The Denial,' 'The Condemnation before Pilate,' 'The Mockery on Calvary,' 'The Shadow of Death,' and 'The Holy Sepulchre.' The style of the composition resembles generally that of Mr. Gaul's previous writings—the same effective, grateful part-writing, and the same expressive and melodious treatment of the solo voice. In those sections, notably that of the Ujajst Condemnation, where the realistic element is predominant, the composer has manifested his ability to write with dramatic force and intensity as well as with lyric charm. In this respect the choral writing distinguished itself in comparison with that in the 'Holy City' and other of the composer's works. Mr. Gaul has not written new hymn tunes for the author's lyrics; the tunes selected are from among those in ordinary congregational use. Altogether considered, Mr. Gaul's new work will, undoubtedly, greatly enhance his already high reputation in the line of sacred composition."—Musical Standard.

Price, paper cover, 2s. 6d.; paper boards, 3s.; scarlet cloth, 4s.
Words only, 7s. 6d. per 100.

The loan of Parts for a limited Orchestra—namely, Strings, 2 Flutes, 2 Clarinets, 2 Cornets, Bass Trombone or Euphonium, and Kettledrums, may be had on application to the COMPOSER, Gillott Lodge, Edgbaston.

STAFF NOTATION. EIGHTEENTH THOUSAND.

THE TEN VIRGINS

A SACRED CANTATA

FOR FOUR SOLO VOICES, CHORUS AND ORCHESTRA

BY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

"Will be heartily welcomed by all who love the art of music."

—Newcastle Journal.

"The work will certainly go through Saxondom in the wake of its predecessors from the same pen."—London Daily Telegraph.

"Must attain popularity wherever heard, and will assuredly be placed among the foremost compositions of this kind by present-day writers... treated in a thoroughly artistic manner... a perfect wealth of melody and striking individuality of style."—Liverpool Daily Courier.

"Works which have placed him in the front rank of English composers—the 'Holy City,' 'Joan of Arc,' and 'The Ten Virgins.'"—Newcastle Daily Journal.

"The choral writing in 'The Ten Virgins' is alone something to be thankful for, and, as we have intimated, it is only one of the many musical virtues of the Cantata."—Leamington Chronicle.

"BOW AND BROMLEY INSTITUTE CHOIR.—The hall was overcrowded by an audience that was disposed to encore every other number of the work. That Mr. Gaul should have secured this undoubted popular success with a work far more contrapuntal than any of his former works is a remarkable tribute to his power of welding science and beauty into one whole."—The Musical Times.

"The subject is an excellent one for a Cantata... a stronger work than 'Joan of Arc.' Melodious, vocal, and of moderate difficulty, and, like Mr. Gaul's earlier Cantatas, will be eagerly welcomed by societies in search of new works having these characteristics."

—Newcastle Daily Leader.

"That 'The Ten Virgins' is a much finer work than the everywhere favourite 'Holy City' we have no doubt whatever. Mr. Gaul has aimed at fine outline and telling colouring, and all that he has aimed at he has achieved."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

Price, paper cover, 2s. 6d.; paper boards, 3s.; cloth, gilt, 4s.
Tonic Sol-fa, 1s.; Vocal Parts, each 1s.; Words only, 5s. per 100.

The loan of instrumental parts may be had on application to the Composer, and full liberty is given to perform these Cantatas and to insert the words in any programme without further permission.

A Modern School for the Violin

BY

AUGUST WILHELMJ AND JAMES BROWN.

THE purpose of this Work is to provide, in one systematic and comprehensive scheme, all that is necessary for the acquirement of the Art of Modern Violin Playing.

"A Modern School for the Violin" consists of Six Books devoted to Daily Technical Practice, Six Books of Studies for Violin alone, and a large number of Pieces with Pianoforte Accompaniment, the Violin parts being specially edited for the purposes of teaching.

SECTION A.—TECHNICAL PRACTICE. IN SIX BOOKS.

The foundation of "A Modern School for the Violin" is laid by means of a series of Six Books dealing exclusively with the important subject of DAILY TECHNICAL PRACTICE. The First Book of Technical Practice (Book 1A) is limited to the 1st Position; the Second Book (2A) to the 1st, 2nd, and 3rd Positions; the Third Book (3A) to the first five Positions; and so on. Bowings and other technical devices are introduced in a similarly progressive manner throughout. Each Book of Technical Practice is divided into "Lessons" (or Chapters), and each Lesson contains a number of short repeating Exercises on some definite point of Violin Technique—as Fingering, Bowing, &c., with the needful explanations. Included in each Book will be found a complete set of Scales and Arpeggi, arranged according to the particular stage of advancement reached.

Taken as a whole, this section is intended to facilitate, and to insist on, a thorough, steady, and continuous progress in the mastery of the Instrument, this being the only possible means of preparing the groundwork for artistic achievement with all its lasting delights.

SECTION B.—STUDIES IN SIX BOOKS.

Section B is formed of a series of original and selected Studies, in Six Books. Each Book of Studies (Section B) is carefully co-ordinated, in respect of difficulty and range of subject, with the correspondingly numbered Book of Technical Practice (Section A). Thus the First Book of Studies (1B) is written in the 1st Position; the Second Book (2B) in the 1st, 2nd, and 3rd Positions; the 3rd Book (3B) in all Positions up to and including the 5th; and so on. It should further be explained that the two Sections are designed to complement one another, and that the "School" must be practised, not in single Books of Technical Practice and Studies alternately, but in pairs. Thus, Books 1A and 1B are to be taken concurrently, then Books 2A and 2B, 3A and 3B, and so on, and the appropriate pairs are now issued bound together in cloth (see Cloth Bindings below).

The musical score is written for two staves in 4/2 time, with a key signature of two flats (B-flat and E-flat). The first system begins with a 'Maestoso' tempo marking and features a forte (f) dynamic. It includes three accents (^) over the first three measures of the upper staff. The second system continues the melody. The third system also continues the melody. The fourth system is marked 'Smoothly' and begins with a piano (p) dynamic. The fifth system returns to a forte (f) dynamic and includes four accents (^) over the first four measures of the upper staff. The piece concludes with the word 'A - men.' in the final measure of the fifth system.

The King, O Lord.

"The King shall rejoice in Thy strength, O Lord."—PSALM xxi. 1.

- 1 THE King, O Lord, in Thee this day rejoices, Glad in the *grace of Thy abundance poured:
Round him the People with ten thousand voices
Loudly acclaim th' Anointed of the Lord:
His heart's desire by Thee is given,
His kingly state is sealed in heaven.
- 2 His Head, Heart, Hands, Thy unction over-flowing
Hallows him now to sit upon his throne;
Counsel and Strength and Government bestowing,
Making his kingship shadow forth Thine own:
Thy holy Oil his face shall cheer
And fill him with Thy holy fear.
- 3 A Crown of gold upon his head is planted;
Blessing of goodness on him Thou dost pour:
Life he has asked of Thee, and Thou hast granted
Long life, for ever and for evermore:
Glory and worship now are his,
Pledge of an everlasting bliss.

Unison.

- 4 O Lord our God, be with us for a Saviour,
As with our fathers in the ancient days:
Pardon our faults, and fashion our behaviour
After Thy laws and in Thy holy ways:
So shall the King rejoice; and we,
Thy people, not go back from Thee.
- 5 To God the Father, Son and Holy Spirit,
Glory and might and majesty belong:
Praise we ascribe to His eternal merit,
Raising on high a nation's thankful song:
Our adoration we outpour:
Glory to God for evermore. Amen.

THE BEST PIANISTS

are those who play with most expression. Much keyboard practice kills delicacy of tone and control, but the MACDONALD SMITH SYSTEM cultivates it to the full, without any drudgery.

Mr. E. W., of Ashton-under-Lyne, says:

"You have opened a new world to me."

Mr. G. E. D., of Gore, New Zealand, says:

"The technical rules and hints, which I have applied, have alone been worth the three guineas."

CAN YOU PLAY AT SIGHT?

Probably you now have to practise a new piece a dozen times over before you can give a satisfactory rendering. Why is this? Simply because you have to translate mentally the musical symbols into the muscular actions which will produce the desired sounds from the piano.

This conscious mental translation should be unnecessary. If you were a good sight-player, your fingers would fall instinctively and automatically on the right notes.

Years of daily practice may enable you to become a good sight-player, but my System cannot fail to do so. I guarantee that a pianist of average ability will become able to play any piece within his or her technical ability after three months of about 15 minutes' daily practising.

Descriptive Booklet sent free to any Pianist.

MRS. ROSA NEWMARCH.

The analytical or descriptive programme is a force in musical education. We do not know who originated the idea, but at least its vogue and utility were evident in the palmy days of the Monday Popular Concerts, to the programmes of which J. W. Davison, who was the musical critic of The Times, contributed his erudition. Then came Grove, with his now almost classic notes in the Crystal Palace orchestral programmes, and since that period we have enjoyed, and at times suffered, the assistance of many programmers, if we may be allowed the word.

Do the concert-going public really want the assistance these annotated programmes profess to give? Does not the music itself make its own appeal? The answer depends upon the plane to which the average listener has ascended, and the degree of his receptiveness. The trained musician does not need help, but we think it can be shown that many other listeners do need it. Listening to modern music with intelligence is an acquired art. Such music seems to presume preparedness. To know what to look for and what phase in artistic evolution this or that composition illustrates opens the door of the mind. On the whole, it is fair to claim that the descriptive programme justifies its existence. How far it should go beyond description towards judicial criticism is a moot point. If attention is drawn to beauties, should it not also be drawn to weaknesses? This is a delicate point dealt with later by the well-known writer who is the subject of this article. Mrs. Rosa Newmarch in recent years has achieved distinction in the musical world by the eloquence, penetration and lucidity of her programme notes. But this is only one of her claims to recognition in musical circles. She is an able critical biographer and historian, and she brings a poetic temperament to bear on all her literary tasks. We feel sure that many concert-goers and readers will be glad to know something of her life and personality.

Mrs. Newmarch was born at Leamington Spa on December 18, 1857. Her father, Samuel Jeaffreson, was a Doctor of Medicine, and her mother was the daughter of James Kenney, a dramatic critic and well-known playwright, also censor of plays in his days, and his second wife, who was daughter of the French dramatist, Sebastian Mercier. Mrs. Jeaffreson considered herself as much French as English. She enjoyed the friendship of Charles and Mary Lamb, Samuel Rogers, Prosper Mérimée, Jules Sandeau, and many other celebrated persons. Rosa Jeaffreson was therefore surrounded by literary influences from her earliest youth. She says that she cannot remember when she was not intensely sensitive to music. When she was a small child, lying in bed with the nursery door open, she would catch fragments of the music going on in the drawing-room, and even then she had a clear feeling for style and knew when the performers passed from Bach to Mozart, or from Chopin to Schumann. A little later, at an aunt's residence in London, she remembers meeting James Davison of The Times, Henry Chorley, and other critics of that period. She was, in fact, always moving in a musical atmosphere, both executive and critical. Her eldest sister was an excellent pianist who had studied under Kullak in Berlin. Another sister, after studying singing with Bussine in Paris, entered the Royal Academy of Music and took a diploma there. In the late seventies, Rosa Jeaffreson shared her sister's life to some extent and made the acquaintance of many musical students who visited her sister for the purpose of music-making. She was now a constant attendant at that economical Elysium of the devotees of music in those days, the shilling seats at the Monday Popular Concerts. As to Opera, she recalls with delight the first performances of 'Lohengrin' with Nilsson as Elsa, and of 'Aida' with Adelina Patti. The Wagner concerts at the Royal Albert in 1877, and Rubinstein's piano recitals are among other strong impressions of this period. But although music loomed so large in her life it was not her serious occupation. Soon after leaving school, when she was about nineteen years of age, she entered Heatherley's School of Art (where, as recorded in the March Musical Times, Sir Henry Wood also studied) in Newman St., Oxford St., and she worked there (less an interval spent in Paris) for about two years. This experience forced her to conclude that painting was not her natural vocation, but she considers that the time spent over the study was formative and helped her to acquire broad comparative views which she probably would not have gained in the ordinary routine of a music school. Her leanings were to a literary life, a desire which had been fostered by her mother, who died in 1871. She had already begun to write for her own pleasure. From 1880 until 1883 she resided out of London, and during this period she acquired some practical knowledge of journalism by writing articles for a provincial newspaper, and meanwhile she kept in touch with music by practising the piano diligently. In 1883 she married Henry Charles, younger son of the Rev. Charles Newmarch, Rector of Leverton, Lincolnshire, and removed to London. She has two children—a son, who is in the medical profession, and a daughter.

It is curious that it was not the visits of Tchaikovsky to this country that fired her well-known enthusiasm for Russian music. That enthusiasm was rather a by-product of a study of the Russian language and literature, undertaken during a wearisome time of ill health at the suggestion of the great art critic, V. Stassov.

In 1897 she visited Russia for the first time, and having acquired some knowledge of the language she had the great advantage of working for a time under Stassov's direction in the Imperial Public Library at St. Petersburg. She made the personal acquaintance of many leading men in the world of music and painting. Rimsky-Korsakov, César Cui, that brilliant recluse, Mily Balakirev, Glazounov, and Liapounov, were some of the musicians, and Repin, who was President of the Academy of Fine Arts, and Verestschagin, were amongst the painters, who contributed at this time to shape her views on art.

Mrs. Newmarch has visited Russia at intervals since the above period, her latest journey having been made in the spring of 1910. As a result of her friendship with the late Professor Morfill, who held the chair of Slavonic languages at Oxford, she has given some attention to the Bulgarian, Serb, and Malo-Russian languages. Although she has translated some short stories by the Bulgarian writer Vazov, and a few folk-poems from the Malo-Russian, she does not claim to be a specialist in these Slavonic tongues. In discussing her almost insatiable linguistic cravings, Mrs. Newmarch is reminded that Renan once hoped for a second life, during which he would be able to read novels and learn Chinese. She has misgivings as to the attraction of a Paradise in which a universal language will be spoken, and she hopes that at least there will be a polyglot corner reserved for those who desire to continue their language study. She is now looking forward, in this mundane state of existence, to learn Swedish, this being the next language on her list.

Since the season 1908-1909 she has written for the Queen's Hall Promenade and Subscription Concerts analytical notes for over seven hundred compositions, long and short, ranging from Bach's Mass in B minor to the Funeral March of a Marionette. This output, with the research work which is so often exacting, and proof correcting, might well be considered sufficient occupation for one woman who, as Mrs. Newmarch herself observes, is rapidly passing 'the usual age.' Yet, notwithstanding this absorbing task, she has contrived to bring out something each year in book form. Last year it was the English edition of Vincent d'Indy's 'César Franck'; this year it will be a translation of Mr. Houston Stewart Chamberlain's 'Das Drama Richard Wagner's.' Last year also she made English versions of two Russian operas: Moussorgsky's 'Boris Godounov' and Tchaikovsky's 'Queen of Spades.' Just now she is translating all Moussorgsky's songs, and a number of other Russian vocal works as well as Sibelius's later songs. The mention of Sibelius suggests a renewed record of the fact that Mrs. Newmarch was one of the first to draw attention to that gifted composer's works.

As to the future, Mrs. Newmarch hopes to have a few more years' energy to concentrate on two large books which will form with her 'Poetry and Progress in Russia' a kind of trilogy and the chief literary work of her life. The first volume would be on Russian music, and the second on Russian painting and architecture. She has amassed a quantity of material for these works, but the time for building the edifice has yet to be found. The ambition thus to review the chief art products of a great nation demands exceptional equipment for its due fulfilment. But all familiar with Mrs. Newmarch's existing achievements know her conspicuous capability for the task, and will look forward to its accomplishment.

Not many so-called honours have come to Mrs. Newmarch. She is honorary member of the Polyglot Club, and last year she was invited to become one of the first six members of the School of Russian studies in the University of Liverpool.

M. Charles Chassé, in the record of an interview with Mrs. Newmarch, which was published in the May, 1908, issue of the 'Bulletin François de la Société Internationale de Musique,' says:

Without respite her active curiosity and her ardent desire for knowledge search all the walks of life. She speaks French, German and Russian. She is poet, musician, and a writer of prose. It is she who has accomplished for England the work which has made M. de Vogue famous in France. By her book 'Poetry and Progress in Russia' she has made the English public acquainted with the great Slavonic poets who prepared the way for the Romantic school. With a rare conscientiousness and power over rhythm she has reconceived many of their poems in English verse. But the rôle of interpreter has not been enough for her; for she has also had her own song, and the sorrowful cadence of 'Horæ Amoris' has revealed to the public a soul which 'sees life through the curtain of music, and music through the curtain of life.'

She believes that English music has entered upon a period of great activity and development. As to the influence exerted by foreign music on the revival, she thinks that some of our composers have submitted too much to the influence of Brahms, who, although a sincere and natural composer, produces on his disciples the curious effect of making them wearisome, even though he gives them academic respectability. As to young composers, the influence of Russian music has been extensive and salutary. They have learned from Tchaikovsky a certain emotional pessimism and in general the art of effective orchestration. The influence of Wagner too is apparent here, and in fact it seems to have penetrated to all nations except Russia. She does not see much hope in a National school founded upon folk-song. It is too late now to revert to this foundation. We are assimilating the world's music, and cannot destroy this and rebuild. As to limits of criticism in programme annotation, Mrs. Newmarch says:

In writing of a new work, I make it a principle to avoid criticism of a kind which might in the smallest degree check or cool the enthusiasm of the public, who are not yet familiar with it. On the other hand I think the 'programmist' is more than justified in pointing out what strikes him, or her, as characteristically beautiful in a work. This may seem one-sided, but in reality it effects the right kind of balance. Most people are capable of some sort of carping criticism for themselves. But to point—with due discrimination—to the things which seem lastingly beautiful in a work can do no harm, and must do good. I think the lack of balanced appreciation is one of our worst faults as a musical nation. I only mention this because, little as I concern myself with the ephemeral criticism which withers during the day—or the night—according to whether it appears in a morning or an evening paper, I have noticed a tendency to fall foul of my programmes because I have tried to set some details in a poetic rather than prosaic light.

We give below extracts from some of Mrs. Newmarch's recent programmes. These illustrate her style of treatment. She does not trouble us with meticulous details, our attention is not drawn to the resolution of the very last diversion of the supertonic minor 13th on the Polish 6th, but her appeal is always æsthetic and seeks to lay bare the underlying poetic bases of the music. She does not attempt to paint the lily, but she is enthusiastic over the charm of its tints.

TCHAIKOVSKY'S 'PATHETIC' SYMPHONY.

The structure of the Symphony must be familiar in every detail to the audience at these Concerts; I need therefore only speak of its poetic basis, and that from a point of view which is avowedly personal and makes no pretensions to be authoritative. Although we have Tchaikovsky's own testimony that his unrevealed programme was 'penetrated by subjective sentiment,' we need not therefore narrow the emotional contents of the Symphony to a mere expression of personal apprehension in the face of death and 'the great misgiving.' Like all lyric poetry this most lyrical of symphonies has a strong vein of self-revelation; but, as in the poetry of Shelley, Heine, or Byron, this lyricism, issuing from an individual source, has its wide, human application. Tchaikovsky gives utterance to thoughts and problems that lie deep down in every thinking mortal. To label such music morbid, pessimistic, neurotic; to repeat truisms to the effect that poets can always find a silver lining in every well-regulated cloud that threatens the horizon of life, is merely to take a superficially optimistic view of a tremendous and inscrutable situation. The experiences which inspired Tchaikovsky in this Symphony are identical with our own; even if we rarely allow them to ripple the surface of life, they agitate its depths in a blind, unconscious way. Therefore when we hear them expressed with such piercing and intimate feeling, Tchaikovsky's music seems to us less a revelation of external truths than a startling emanation from our own innermost being.

SIBELIUS'S TONE-POEM, 'EN SAGA.'

(The Last Section.)

We seem to hear a tale of love and heroic death, half sung, half recited, by some inspired bard. Grim and shadowy figures are evoked by the music; ghostly sighs are borne back from days that have long since sped; a deep undercurrent of elegiac sentiment runs through it all. At the great outburst towards the close, perhaps the assembled warriors, stirred by the bard's recital, start up to acclaim the memory of some perished hero? When the smoke-stained rafters have ceased to ring with their praise, does some dreamy soul still sit on in the darkened hall, while the echoes of the past linger a moment and fade out with the last gleam of the embers? Or was the whole episode the creation of this dreamer's fancy—a Saga indeed—a tale woven of memory's flickering firelight? In the absence of any definite clue to the composer's intention, such interpretations can only be accepted as being merely fanciful.

GRANVILLE BANTOCK.

To those who more than a decade ago first felt keenly interested in Bantock's music, two of the most hopeful signs were the vastness of his ambitions and the megasthenic scale on which he ventured to plan his early efforts. When he started his career, the prospects of the younger composers were much less favourable than they have since become; consequently many of them shunned the hopeless issue of writing orchestral works, and tended too much to the miniature. To hear of one whose imagination was equal to planning twenty-four symphonic poems on the basis of one of the dullest classics in the English language, was to hail him as a splendid reaction from the cult of the musical bagatelle. Time and matured taste have brought Bantock's works within a reasonable scope; they have ceased to be planned as revolving panoramas and have become canvases; canvases still on a scale of superb amplitude—like those of Tintoretto or Veronese, and as full of life and colour—but kept within the limits of clear vision.

Granville Bantock was still a young man when he 'heard the East a-calling' in his musical dreams. The influence of the older civilization showed itself in some of his earliest works. This was not a mere intellectual pose, but a genuine affinity with the Oriental spirit, which may be compared to Keats's natural assimilation of the Greek feeling and culture. Bantock has proved, however, that he has other sympathies, and knows other poets than Omar and Hafz. His interests are many-sided; he will never become 'the poet of one mood in all his lays'; and this fantastic overture 'The Pierrot of the Minute' shows that he can exchange the atmosphere of the desert, or the Persian rose-garden, for that of the Parc du Petit Trianon with a subtle mental adaptability that is quite of the twentieth century.

ELGAR'S VIOLIN CONCERTO.

If it may seem to some a little fanciful to think of this work as actually having its roots in the Characteristic Studies for Violin, Op. 24, it is interesting to reflect, in passing, how very different in style and sentiment the Concerto would certainly have been had the composer realized his youthful dream of becoming a virtuoso. We have only to think of the Concertos of Liszt, Rubinstein, Saint-Saëns—of all the moderns, in fact, who have tasted the heady wine of executive triumph—to realize how dissimilar is their conception of this form as compared to that of the composers who have not been virtuosos. In the latest examples of this kind of work, it seems as though the tendency of modern musicians was carrying us too far from the starting-point of the Concerto, which was to set the soloist in a full, though not a garish, light. Brahms was perhaps the first who exacted from the soloist a considerable measure of self-denial, virtuosity being distasteful to him for its own sake. But when we consider how—even after Beethoven had raised it to the loftiest spheres—the Concerto at the moment of its greatest popularity was caught in the toils of the Rossinian spirit; when we remember how the world was flooded with superficial works, in which the thematic ideas were engulfed in whirlpools of trills, arpeggios, and scales—decorative figures designed for no purpose but display—the present reaction against virtuosity seems natural enough. Altogether the tendency of contemporary composers is to approach the larger musical forms later in life, to give to their poetic material greater depth and emotional complexity, and consequently to write one or two where their predecessors turned out half a dozen.

ELGAR'S SYMPHONY IN A FLAT.

From the time when Beethoven wrote his fifth Symphony, and appropriated the form once for all to ideal uses and to complexity of emotional expression undreamed of by his predecessors, composers have shown an increasing tendency to delay the moment of initiation into this, the highest rite of the musical cult. Since the lightly woven, graceful-patterned symphonies that were 'of the morning and the May'—and can still give pleasure and refreshment because of their very remoteness from our modern feeling—can never again become a sincere reproduction of this age, a musician instinctively feels that he must await a full measure of maturity before attempting to vie with this music 'wrought of life and death' of which Beethoven left us the inescapable tradition. No one would now venture to refill the cup of symphonic form over and over again with the light and innocuous vintages of the past, since it has once been 'brimmed with mighty red'—the potent wine that is crushed from the grapes of Fate itself. For—to leave these somewhat bacchanalian smiles—it is clear that we cannot hope for a great modern symphony except from an artist whose life-experience is full and mellow; from one who has also learnt to blend the existing varieties of symphonic form into a plastic medium for the individual expression of universal thoughts and emotions. Now that there is hardly a spiritual or mental condition which music cannot echo and reflect, the musician who continued to write the kind of purely geometrical and objective music that expressed nothing but itself would be in the position of the painter who still clung to the limitations of the Byzantine iconographers. Admitting, then, the futility of writing music which does not set its hearers seeking for any inner meaning at all, the modern composer has the choice of two methods, both of which have led to the creation of masterpieces that the world could ill spare. He may express himself in the symphonic poem, with its concrete programme, or in that new and modified form of symphony which is the logical outcome of Beethoven's Fifth. Here, while adhering to the broad lines of the classical model, the composer is still concerned with the expression of a kind of programme; it has no literary basis, but it may—indeed it must—have a more or less definite emotional one. The clues to such a work will be found in its themes and their transformations, just as in the symphonic poem; only we do not need to have them labelled, because the composer has not set out in this instance to weave a tonal romance around one or more characters, but bids us rather to listen to the 'musical shrivings of the soul,' as Tchaikovsky expressed it; the utterance of thoughts and feelings for which words seem inadequate. Like the last three symphonies of the Russian composer, the work now before us seems to have a clear, but wordless, psychological programme. The composer of to-day—even while keeping his respect for classical tradition—cannot ignore what the symphonic poem has done to make his language richer and more supple. It becomes more and more probable that a musician who has much to express will be equally attracted to both forms, and will only be able to reveal himself completely by alternating between the symphonic poem and the emotional symphony. There is nothing blameworthy in this fluctuation, for it is easy to realize that a composer may feel at one period of his life that an ebullient and roving fancy works better within the restrictive limits of a settled programme, while at another phase of his career he may know himself able to give expression to ideas and feelings which cannot be referred to any definite subject. Nor can we quarrel with a seeming inconsistency which has endowed the world with such contrasting utterances of individual temperament as Tchaikovsky's 'Francesca da Rimini' and his 'Pathetic' Symphony, or Elgar's 'In the South' and the A flat Symphony.

The following short poems from two of Mrs. Newmarch's published volumes have a musical interest and illustrate another phase of her mental activity.

TO AN INSTRUMENT.

Others, before he came with mastery
To set thy steps to choral-songs of praise,
Or draw thy subtlest undertones from thee,
Essayed to wake thy spirit in past days.
His touch is stilled for ever. Yet I stand
And listen while thy soulless, fickle keys,
In dull obedience to a stranger's hand,
For other ears give forth fresh voluntaries.
And some there be, whose hearts thus lightly move
In shallow melody to each new touch,
And deem these mutable vibrations Love.
O Unforgotten, mine is not of such!

My heart shall be like some rare instrument,
Whose strings broke when its only player went.

PRELUDE TO DAY.

The violins had stirred with hopes that died,
Like winds too weak to usher in the morn,
While to the dark-toned basses still replied
The sad, uncertain echo of the horn.

The impending mass of music seemed to brood
Inert and torpid, as nocturnal earth
Waits pulseless in the vague disquietude
Of that last hour which shrouds the daylight's birth.

Until the blare of trumpets came to break
And splinter darkness into scarlet bars;
Then hark-scales, as from thrushes half awake,
And harp-chords like the farewell sigh of stars.

But last of all the effulgence of your voice
Dawned, scattering all the lingering fears of night,
And bade my heart grow warm, my soul rejoice,
As though God said once more, Let there be light.

SOME GERMAN 'PASSIONS' OF THE 17TH CENTURY.

By H. C. COLLES.

The more one studies the history of the German Passion music the more stupendous seems the sense of proportion which J. S. Bach exercised in framing the 'St. Matthew Passion.' So complete is his design that one hardly realizes that it presented any problem in construction at all, that he had to co-ordinate a number of conflicting elements and make them all relevant to the expression of an essential idea. But if we turn back to the more primitive attempts to give artistic shape to the same idea, and see how his predecessors were conquered by the details until that idea became overshadowed, one gets a fresh light upon Bach's genius.

The story of the Passion as it is chanted in Catholic churches during Holy Week provided the root idea of the German Passion; that is to say, an exposition of the sacred story made clear by being sung to a plainsong, and expressive by the use of certain inflexions in the plainsong. Even when further heightened by the polyphonic choruses of such composers as Vittoria, Soriano, or our own William Byrd, it remained rather a formula of devotion than a work of art, since composers could only deal with the less important parts of the story—the sayings of the disciples, of the priests and Levites, or of the crowd.

Heinrich Schütz was the first who, in setting the German text for the Lutheran Church, expressed the German ideal with any consistency; and although he used practically only the means at the disposal of the Catholic musicians, that is to say a choir of voices and solo singers without any accompaniment, his settings according to each of the four Evangelists actually contain in embryo the elements of Bach's Passions as far as the narrative is concerned, with even a hint of the reflective attitude of mind which later brought such momentous additions to the form. It is no more than a hint, but the final chorus ('Beschluss'), which in three cases out of the four is a short polyphonic treatment of one verse of some well-known hymn, is enough to show that his mind had turned towards the meditative side of the situation. Each one of his four Passions, too, opens with a choral 'Introitus,' the words of which, however, are simply an announcement of the Gospel from which the text is taken. Thus: 'Das Leiden unsers Herren Jesu Christi, wie es beschreibet der Heilige Evangeliste Matthæus.'

The statement is of course a purely liturgical one, but Schütz used it as an opportunity for musical decoration just as his predecessors and contemporaries in the Catholic Church decorated the 'initial letters' of the Lamentations with a profusion of rich polyphony, producing a musical parallel to the exquisite illuminated missals of the mediæval scribes. The parallel is indeed a very close one, for just as the work in the illuminated missals was sometimes purely decorative and at other times pictorial, so the musicians, and Schütz among them, were sometimes caught by the attractions of illustration. The 'Introitus' to the 'Resurrection,' one of his earlier works, is perhaps the most vivid example of pictorial music of its date. The harmonic change from the sombre and incomplete chord of D minor to the brilliantly scored one of E major, is a direct illustration of the word.

The example suggests another point of affinity between Schütz and Bach; his opening and closing movements show him susceptible both to reflections upon the story and to direct illustration of words such as Bach made a part of his scheme.

When we come to Schütz's treatment of the Passion story itself, we see the German idea of a wholly spontaneous and unfettered recital of the Gospel words gradually asserting itself. It is not surprising that the choruses, Voces turbarum, should be the most completely emancipated, for composers had exercised their art upon them even within the Catholic Church, but certain passages of declamation

(it would be inaccurate to call it recitative) in the parts of the Evangelist and others are thrown into strong relief by the very fact that they are seen in direct contrast to the plainsong tradition which elsewhere often dominates Schütz. In the 'St. Mark Passion,' Schütz preserves the chant with very little modification thus:

Ex. 2.

und nach zweien Tagen war Os-tern und die Tagen der süs-sen Brot, und die Hohenpriester und Schriftgelehrten such-ten, wie sie Jesum mit Listen griffen und töd-ten. sie a-ber . . . sprach-en.

It represents his starting-point, and it is only when one has gone through the 'St. Mark Passion' with its endless repetition of the same chant, monotonous recitation and conventional inflexions and endings, that one is ready to grasp the immense difference existing between such a style and that of his 'St. Matthew Passion.' In the latter the whole declamation is free, even though the phraseology is sometimes that of plainsong, and where his mind shakes off its fetters most completely one cannot fail to notice a remarkable likeness to Schütz's recitative.

The scene of the betrayal by Judas is a striking example. It is quite evident that the contrast between the nervous excitement of Judas and the gentle calm with which he is greeted by the Master took hold of Schütz's imagination as it did later of Bach's, and his attempt to convey the impression led him to use the same melodic contours though on a much smaller scale. An examination of the two passages side by side shows both the likenesses and the differences in the most direct way, and both are significant. Schütz retained the square and lozenge-shaped notes of plain-song, but they are here translated into semi-breves and minims for the sake of convenience:

Ex. 3.

SCHÜTZ. JUDAS. EVANGELIST.

Wel-chen ich küs-sen wer-de, der, der ist's, den.. greif-et. Und alsbald trat er zu Je-su und .. sprach:

EVANGELIST.

BACH. Wel-chen ich küs-sen wer-de, der ist's, den greif-et. Und als-bald trat er zu Je-sum und sprach:

JUDAS. EVANGELIST.

Ge-grüs-set seist du, Rab-bi. Und küs-set .. ihn. Je-su a-ber sprach zu ihm:

JUDAS. EVANGELIST.

Ge-grüs-set seist du, Rab-bi. Und küs-se-te ihn. Je-sus a-ber sprach zu ihm:

JESUS.

Mein Freund, war-um bist du kom-men?

JESUS.

Mein Freund, war-um bist du kom-men?

The first words are treated by Schütz as a direct statement, by Bach as an oblique one by the Evangelist of what Judas had said. Otherwise the parts are allotted in the same way except that Schütz, reserving the bass voice for the Master, makes Judas an alto, thus choosing the least manly quality for him. The eagerness of the repeated 'der,' 'That, that is he,' and the rising phrase to which the words are set by Schütz, give the feeling of tension, thrown into high relief by the fact that the next words of the Evangelist are given in the impersonal tones of plain-song, using the conventional cadence (cf. Ex. 2). In what follows the similarity of outline between the settings of the two composers is obvious; Judas's half mocking, half fearful 'Gegrüßet,' rising a fourth on the high notes of the voice, the touch of shame in the drop of the Evangelist's voice at the words, 'und küssete ihn,' and finally the sorrowful reproof of the 'Mein Freund,' and the delicate inflexion of the question of Christ. Moreover, Bach's favourite device of beginning a phrase on a high note (which is often the despair of conductors who cannot make tenor singers realize that a high note is not necessarily a long or important one) is anticipated by Schütz (see asterisks), although the plan is the opposite of the usual plainsong method.

It would be possible to give many other instances in which Schütz's declamation reached forward in the direction of Bach's most powerful recitative. One more only must be given, however, this time from the 'St. John Passions,' because it brings out both the likeness and the difference. The likeness is in the conception of the idea, the difference in the workmanship:

Ex. 4.

SCHÜTZ. EVANGELIST.
Est ist . . . voll . . . bracht! Und . . . nei - get das Haupt und . . . ver - schied.

BACH. EVANGELIST.
Und nei - get das Haupt und ver - schied.

Both convey the abandonment of life in the droop of the voice between the two phrases of the words, but Bach does it by a transient modulation from the key of B minor to that of F sharp minor, involving his favourite interval of the diminished 7th. Schütz, writing in the beautiful phrygian mode, falls to its characteristic cadence, and in this moment his expression of the idea seems more complete than Bach's, because more simple.

This example brings us naturally to Schütz's treatment of the meditative side of the Passion music, for it happens that the 'St. John' is the only one of the four settings in which the 'Beschluss' follows immediately on the statement of the death of Christ, so that the last verse of the hymn 'Christus der uns selig macht' comes with peculiar force. The words are:

'O hilf, Christe, Gottes Sohn,
durch dein bitt'res Leiden, dass wir dir stets unterthan,
all' Untugend meiden;
deinen Tod und sein' Ursach' fruchtbarlich bedenken, da für, wie wohl arm und schwach, dir Dankopfer schenken.'

And the quotation of the opening shows well the pure and reflective style of the music:

Ex. 5.

O hilf, Chri - ste, Got - tes Sohn
O hilf, Chri - ste, Got - tes Sohn
O hilf, Chri - ste, Got - tes Sohn

It looks backward to the older types of contrapuntal church music, whereas many of the dramatic choruses in the course of the work look forward in an extraordinary degree to the incisive style of Bach. The following passage from the 'Crucify him' chorus of 'St. Mark' (which, though the most confined in its recitative, is the richest in its choruses) shows remarkable daring in melody and in harmony of the kind which Bach developed to the highest pitch later:

[illegible]

The undulating arpeggio, in the bass here, is the chief motive of the whole chorus; it surges through each part in turn, and, harmonized with bold chromatic passages and grinding suspensions, it suggests at least some of the effect of a clamouring rabble which Bach produced in both his settings of the same episode. The clear parallel between Schütz's treatment of the question 'Lord, is it I?' and Bach's has been pointed to by historians, and it is therefore worth while to give Schütz's chorus here for purposes of comparison, especially since it shows his treatment of quite another type from that of the last example:

Ex. 7. Herr, bin ich's? Herr, bin ich's? bin ich's? bin ich's, bin ich's?

Herr, Herr, bin ich's? bin ich's? bin ich's? bin ich's? bin ich's?

Herr, bin ich's! bin ich's? bin ich's? bin ich's? bin ich's? . . .

Even from these slight examples it is possible to get an indication of the impression which the study of the whole of Schütz's Passions gives, that, like Bach, he was alive to every kind of suggestion which could be gleaned from the words, and that once his mind became possessed by an idea he had no difficulty in translating it into appropriate musical language within the limits of the means at his disposal.

It was after Schütz, when the means became more complex and they were being dealt with by less clear-sighted intelligences, that the details of the scheme began to cloud the issue. If we pass over some forty or fifty years, and glance at the Passion music of the end of the 17th century, we seem to be much further from the spirit of Bach even though in some respects we are nearer to his form. The settings of the story according to St. Matthew, by Johann Sebastiani and Johann Theile (produced in 1672 and 1673 respectively), are accessible now to the ordinary student because they have been reprinted in the 'Denkmaeler Deutscher Tonkunst' (vol. xvii.). Each has an orchestral accompaniment, the former for two violins, four violas and basses, the latter for the same instruments without the violins.

Moreover, Sebastiani was probably the first composer to include chorales as a part of his work, though there is evidence to show that they had been introduced as congregational hymns into earlier settings according to the discretion of the minister. But Sebastiani provided that a chorale (sometimes one verse, sometimes more, and in one case as many as eight verses) should be sung as a soprano solo at the most salient points in the story. Thus when Christ justifies the woman's offering with the words, 'She did it for My burial,' a verse of 'O Welt ich muss dich lassen' follows, and a dramatic rather than a contemplative use of the chorale 'Gott sei gelobt' occurs in the scene of the Last Supper, representing the hymn of the Apostles before they went out to the Mount of Olives. Theile, too, brought an important addition to the form, for in place of hymn tunes sung as solos he wrote several original arias, generally for soprano voice; but in one case, that which follows the denial of Peter, he uses a tenor for the purpose (Peter is a tenor), as though to emphasize the personal aspect of the lament. That Theile's arias are quite untouched by the influence of those of Italian opera will be seen by the quotation of this one:

Ex. 8.

Ach, wo soll ich mich hin - wen - den, mein - e . . . Not zu ü - ber sehn? wird Gott kein - e Gna - de sen - den, Ach, so . . ist's mit mir ge - schehn, mein bö's Ge - wis - sen pla - get mich, dass ich ge - flucht so fre - vent - lich, und drei mal mein - em Gott ver - leug - net.

[The figures are obviously incomplete. They are given here as they appear in the "Denkmaeler."]

It has an unmistakable, expressive beauty of its own in the mixture which it presents between the chorale style and the declamatory one, and one may find its counterpart to some extent in the ariosos and accompanied recitatives of Bach. Such things mark the beginnings of certain traditions which Bach adopted, and yet these Passions as wholes seem infinitely further away from him than does Schütz, because it is only in the accessories and not in the fundamental treatment of the story that they approach him. Most of the recitative is accompanied by instruments playing in ostensibly contrapuntal parts, and consequently the voice is cramped and forced to proceed according to harmonic rule. There is no spontaneity in its declamation. The choruses, too, are distressingly perfunctory. Sebastiani is content to get the words in somehow upon reiterated chords, and Theile only makes a show of counterpoint where Schütz gave dramatic veracity. Neither is mainly occupied with the truthful presentation of the Passion story, but with considerations of workmanship and points of exterior effect. And so, simple and innocent as these works appear, the decadence had set in which, with the coming of Italian opera to Germany and the development of the oratorio style, fairly overwhelmed the form of the Passion music. How far the reflection upon the story came to obscure the story itself is shown in Brockes's well-known libretto, set by Handel among many other composers, in which the Bible words are paraphrased and deprived of all the subtle suggestions of character which appealed to Schütz so eloquently. Librettos by Neumeister and others went further, until the story was practically ignored in favour of sentimental reflections upon it.

The stages cannot be followed out here; they are referred to rather to emphasize the remarkable balance of mind which Bach showed in dealing with the confused state of things. A narrow-minded purist would have swept away all the accretions and returned to the primitive form of Schütz or earlier. Kuhnau, in fact, Bach's worthy predecessor at Leipsic, attempted something of the kind in the 'St. Mark Passion' which he brought out in 1721, but like all reactionary efforts it was quite futile, and made no permanent impression upon the art. Bach restored the narrative to its rightful place, and presented it with greater intensity of feeling and in more vivid musical terms than it had ever received before; and so far from stripping it bare in order to do this, he added greatly to the variety of the subsidiary commentary. He was well able to do so, since everything was made relevant to the ideas generated directly by the narrative, but one has to hear the 'St. Matthew Passion' complete in order to realise how perfectly proportioned is each element of its design.

Occasional Notes.

The musical world will be interested to know that Sir Edward Elgar's second Symphony is completed and that the full-score is engraved. A miniature edition of the score is in preparation, and will shortly be published by Messrs. Novello. The motto on the score is the first two lines of one of the last Love Poems of Shelley :

Rarely, rarely comest thou,
Spirit of Delight.

As announced on p. 234, the first performance of the new work will be given by the Queen's Hall Orchestra on May 24. The second performance will be given by the London Symphony Orchestra, at the concert to be given at the Queen's Hall on June 1, in connection with the International Congress of Musicians (May 29 to June 3). This will also be conducted by the composer. We shall give a full account of the Symphony in our May issue.

The arrangements for the above-mentioned Congress are taking definite shape. The details are too elaborate for us to give in full here. The new prospectus can be obtained by applying to the Honorary Secretaries, 160, Wardour Street, London, W. A serial ticket admitting to all the lectures, concerts and entertainments (except the banquet at the Savoy Hotel and an Opera performance at Covent Garden) will cost one guinea. Members of the International Musical Society will be charged 12s. 6d. The foreign members will be invited to all gatherings free of expense.

This year is the centenary of the birth of Liszt. It is noteworthy, and rather ominously significant, that, so far, no announcement has been made of any intention to celebrate the occasion in this country. Yet surely his memory is worth a Mass, for undoubtedly he was a force in the development of the art, and especially in pianistic art. We recall the great reception the celebrated musician had when he came to London in 1886. Our issue in May of that year fully recorded the tribute that was then paid to his genius. We may appropriately quote the concluding paragraph of the eight-page article that appeared in the above number:

The year 1886 will long be remembered by the lustre thrown upon it by the presence of a truly great man, the most imposing figure in the musical world, not only of to-day, but for a generation past. And now that he has tested the warmth of English feeling, we can only express the hope—wherein we but re-echo the wish of thousands—that he may be long spared to put our friendliness again and again to the proof. We welcomed him with pleasure; we part with unfeigned regret from FRANZ LISZT.

The condition of music in the London County Council schools has been investigated by a special representative of The Times, and very ably reported upon in three long articles that appeared in that journal during the last month. An editorial leading article that appeared on March 11 sums up the reports, and pays high tribute to the work accomplished by organizers and the school teachers, and to the capacity exhibited by the children. The public generally are too little aware of the faithful musical instruction given in our best managed elementary schools. Dr. Borland, the L.C.C. Inspector of Music, has reason to be proud of his association with such fruitifying work. A full digest of the article appears in the April number of The School Music Review.

The preliminary prospectus of the London Musical Festival of 1911 says:

After a lapse of nine years, London is once more to have its Musical Festival. It is certainly one of the anomalies of English musical life, that whilst our creative activities and general interest in the art have quickened and developed in a phenomenal degree, that whilst the great festival schemes hold their ground in the provinces, and the Association of Competition Festivals has spread its influence far and wide over the country, the metropolis should still remain without any periodical event which corresponds to the leading Continental festivals, or the great musical meetings held in our provincial and cathedral cities. It was to supply this deficiency that Mr. Robert Newman organized the first London Musical Festival in May, 1899.

Conditions have altered since 1899, and it might be suggested that if there is any city that does not stand in need of a Festival, it is London. A weary critic has complained that a London season is one long Festival. However, the welcome afforded to such a proposal depends upon the details of the scheme, and there can be no doubt in the case of the London Festival that the programmes are unusually attractive.

On May 22, at the evening concert with which the Festival will open, the Norwich Festival chorus will sing in Elgar's 'The Dream of Gerontius.' It will be remembered that the choir paid a visit to Queen's Hall in April, 1909, and gave an interpretation of 'The Dream of Gerontius' that was notable for its suave beauty of expression and vocal purity. On May 26 the Sheffield Chorus will sing in Bach's Mass in B minor, with all the advantage of the special training which Sir Henry Wood is now giving them for the Sheffield Festival, as described in our last issue. On May 27 the Festival will terminate with a performance (commencing at 12 o'clock, with an interval of one hour) of Bach's 'St. Matthew' Passion music, the Leeds Choral Union providing the chorus. All of these performances will be conducted by Sir Henry Wood.

In spite of the attractiveness of this section of the programme, one need have no hesitation in saying that the most interesting feature of the Festival will be the first performance, under the composer's direction, of Sir Edward Elgar's second Symphony, in E flat. This will take place on the afternoon of May 24. At the same concert new works by Dr. Walford Davies and Professor Granville Bantock will be produced with the composers as conductors. Mr. Percy Pitt will introduce a new work from his pen on May 23, when the remainder of the programme, conducted by Sir Henry Wood, will include Elgar's Violin concerto. Debussy's 'Rondes de Printemps' will be performed for the first time in England. On May 25 Dr. Richard Strauss will conduct a programme selected from his own and Mozart's works.

On February 28 the Master of Oxford University moved in Congregation to approve the preamble of a statute (1) establishing a Board of Studies for music, (2) providing that no one who has not been admitted to the degree of Bachelor of Arts shall be eligible for the degree of Bachelor of Music unless he has passed in a group of the Final Pass School, pursued a course of study approved by the Board of Studies, and had his name on the books of the University for at least twelve terms. It was explained that the obligation to keep the name on the books did not involve actual residence.

At the Worcester Musical Festival, September 13 to 15, a revised edition of Bach's 'St. Matthew' Passion music, which has been prepared by Sir Edward Elgar and Mr. Ivor Atkins, will be used. This edition will be published shortly by Novello & Co.

In our article on Sir Henry Wood in our last issue, his appointment in 1908 as conductor of the Norwich Musical Festival was by inadvertence not recorded.

DR. WALFORD DAVIES'S SYMPHONY.

The prospective programmes of the London Symphony Orchestra announce that the first of the season's concerts which Herr Nikisch will conduct on May 15 will include the production of a new Symphony by Dr. H. Walford Davies. This is not the composer's first work of the kind, for as long ago as 1895 Manns brought out his first Symphony at the Crystal Palace, and it was one of the earliest works which drew public attention to Walford Davies's compositions. It, however, aroused interest more or less as a promising student's work. Nine years later 'Everyman' made the composer generally known to the larger musical public, and even since 'Everyman' his style and especially his command of the orchestra has matured considerably. Two works since that time have shown him working in the direction of symphonic form: 'Lift up your hearts,' produced at Hereford, 1906, which is actually a symphony with chorus, and the Festal Overture, which is almost a symphony in miniature.

The symphony (Op. 32) which Herr Nikisch will conduct is in G major; it has four movements, each one of which is complete in itself and detached, but there is strong thematic connection between the first and the last movements. The bold theme of the slow introduction (Largo maestoso) with which the Symphony opens is the most important of the various features which give unity to the work. A progression of three chords (G major, C minor and E minor) is characteristic of the theme, and a stately rhythmic figure founded upon these is given out at once by the strings and horns (f), while drums and basses reiterate the key-note with a persistent tread. The idea is fully dealt with and passed through several phases before it gives way to the Allegro. One smooth, almost ecclesiastical version of it is heard on the strings, another more agitated and plaintive development follows, so that it is quite evident that the greatest importance is attached to it—in fact, that it is one of the principal characters in the drama. The Allegro fervente is brought in by a rushing upward scale-passage which leads to a strong and impulsive subject. The most striking characteristic of the ardent movement which it introduces is the amount of musical material which plays a part in it. The ordinary divisions of first and second subject are scarcely applicable, though the ideas roughly fall into two groups, and one rich and exuberant tune in D major stands out with special prominence. It, like the theme of the introduction, extends its influence into the last movement. The plan of increasing the members of the 'cast,' so to speak, of a symphony is one with which composers have been busy in experiment ever since Beethoven. This work offers some remarkable instances of the modifying effect upon the subsequent form of the whole movement which a large number of clearly contrasted ideas must bring. In the first place the part technically known as the exposition takes up an unusually large proportion of the first movement, and this entails considerable compression afterwards. Development and recapitulation are largely carried on at the same time, the themes being amplified and extended as they are passed again in review. The introductory theme takes an impressive place in the development, and its presence always introduces a more contemplative attitude of mind, stilling the energetic impulse of the themes belonging to the first subject-group and contrasting with the frank happiness of those in the second group. It grows stronger and more or less takes possession of the Coda.

A slow movement (Lento espressivo) in B flat major opens with a sonorous cadence figure which seems to bear some relationship to the introductory theme of the first movement; it clears away and gives place to a serene melody which is the principal theme of the movement, and which when it is expanded recalls some passages in 'Everyman,' such as the Song of Knowledge. The resemblance is probably quite fortuitous, but it is mentioned to suggest the prevailing mood of the slow movement, which has a more strenuous, agitated middle section.

A purely delightful and unfettered Romanza, Allegro felice (D major) takes the place of a Scherzo and is lightly scored for small orchestra (strings, wood-wind, horns and harp). One happy tune springs out of another simply and naturally, the form seems to make itself, and the whole atmosphere is as light-hearted and spring-like as anything could possibly be. This mood passes quickly, and the Finale is preluded by a short episode in which the oboe broods over a plaintive melody added above sustained chords played by a quartet of violoncellos. This seems less of an introduction to the Finale than a delay purposely introduced to check the feeling produced by the Romanza. Soon the chief theme of the Finale, a marching tune in G minor, sweeps away the brooding introduction, and from henceforward the course of the Symphony is scarcely clouded at all. As in the first movement so in the Finale there is a great wealth of thematic material, but the tunes here seem less contrasted and more closely related. Indeed the chief second subject, a tune which quite carries one away by its spirit, is so closely connected with the first that it seems like a sublimated major version of it. As the movement nears the end, the ideas become more closely associated. The main introductory theme, the first of the whole Symphony, is heard in direct contradiction to the most merry of the Finale tunes, and in the Coda the various melodies jostle one another much as do those in the Quodlibet of the 'Festal Overture,' and the Symphony ends in a mood of the utmost exhilaration.

OPERA IN THE CORONATION YEAR.

BY HERMANN KLEIN.

There would seem at present to be no likelihood of such another spell of operatic activity during the current year as was experienced in London in 1910. To begin with, Mr. Thomas Beecham has, for the time being at any rate, joined the Directorate of the Grand Opera Syndicate, and thus secured Covent Garden against the serious opposition which he at one time threatened in the shape of a projected season at Drury Lane. There will be no opera at His Majesty's Theatre; Mr. Oscar Hammerstein's new opera-house in Kingsway will not be ready for opening until the middle of November at the very earliest. In a word, for the whole of the Coronation season Covent Garden will have the field to itself, and will consequently more than ever reflect the distinction and brilliancy that are peculiar to our leading opera-house in virtue of those unique social advantages which it has so long enjoyed. It is wonderful, if one comes to think of it, how circumstances have tended for so many years to concentrate the interest of the public, as far as opera is concerned, in the brief annual proceedings at Covent Garden. Nothing done elsewhere seems really to count or to matter. Even the best of the autumn seasons given under the same roof appear to possess only a secondary degree of importance in the eyes of opera-goers. Here, as in America, and more especially at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, it is the support, the influence, the caprice of Society that keeps Opera going and regulates the movement of its mainspring.

There is leeway to be made up this year—something to be done to make up for the mournful dullness of perfunctory methods which characterized the greater part of last season's opera nights at Covent Garden. What was due then to the shadow cast by the sudden death of King Edward VII. will be replaced now by the extra grandeur and luxurious splendour of the events associated with the forthcoming Coronation of King George V. So much has been made evident, not merely by the unusually early announcement of a fixed date for the Coronation Gala Performance (to take place on Monday, June 26), but by the promise of the largest subscription known in the recent history of Covent Garden. Of the artistic side of things one can only judge by the preliminary prospectus issued a few weeks ago, but this suffices to afford a tolerably clear indication of what is going to be done, and also of what is going to be left untouched, during the fourteen weeks' season extending from April 22 to July 31. Considerable outcry was occasioned, both at home and in the columns of certain sensitive German newspapers, by the fact that German Opera had been entirely omitted from the scheme. There were, however, two reasons for this omission: first, because the French and Italian répertoires had grown to such proportions that it was found impracticable to include the German without doing injustice to one of the three; and secondly, because it had already been arranged, though not publicly announced (as it should have been in the same prospectus), that a season of German Opera was to be given by the Syndicate at Covent Garden some time next autumn. As soon as this intention was made known no further complaints were heard from quarters that in the least mattered, though the stupid cry of 'boy-cott' raised by a Frankfort paper was maintained for a time with a persistence absurdly suggestive of some claim to an international right. Two cycles of 'The Ring' will duly be given in November, and a representative selection of popular works, old and modern, including, no doubt, 'Salome' and 'Elektra'; but whether 'Der Rosenkavalier' will be produced at Covent Garden or some smaller house remains to be seen. Anyhow it will not be given by the Syndicate at all, but by Mr. Fred. C. Whitney, who will mount Strauss's new opera here on a lavish scale early in the coming autumn.

On the other hand, two absolute novelties will be brought forward at Covent Garden during the 'grand' season which begins this month. These are Massenet's 'Thaïs,' an opera of considerable merit and charm, which has enjoyed quite a vogue in America during the past few years; and Puccini's new opera (written for New York), 'The Girl of the Golden West.' The list further comprises:

A glance at the above selection will serve to convince the reader that the tastes of the Covent Garden habitué have been carefully studied in its choice. Five operas to the name of Puccini—say a third of the entire Italian group—would alone suffice to demonstrate that fact. It is a phenomenon new to the constitution of these documents, and, be the portent good or otherwise, it is worthy of note as a sign of the times. Verdi now takes second place with three operas, only one of them belonging to his third and best period; while of the French collection Gounod alone furnishes more than a solitary example. Yet as a whole it must be admitted that the répertoire will be fairly representative of its particular schools, and betrays a decided leaning in favour of modern and living composers.

The executive talent so far engaged is quite up to the average. The following preliminary list speaks for itself. It does not include the name of a new French tenor who was engaged early last month, and concerning whom private report speaks very highly indeed:

Mmes. Emmy Destinn Marie Louise Edvina Maria Kousnietzoff	Soprani. Mmes. Nellie Melba Luïsa Tetrazzini
Mmes. A. L. Bérat De Georgis	Contralti. Mmes. Kirkby Lunn Orner
MM. Amedeo Bassi Charles Dalmorès Maurice D'Oisly Paul Franz	Tenors. MM. Riccardo Martin John McCormack Edmond Warnery Dante Zucchi
MM. Edmund Burke Armand Crabbé Gilly Pompilio Malatesta	Basses and Baritones. MM. Vanni Marcoux G. Mario Sammarco Leon Sibirakoff
Conductors. MM. Cleofonte Campanini, Ettore Panizza, Percy Pitt Tcherepnine.

Another notable feature will be the appearance, towards the latter part of the season, of the Imperial Russian Ballet, who will bring with them their own scenery, costumes and accessories. Then on some evenings the programme will be devoted to ballet only, and on others opera and ballet will be given conjointly. The répertoire of this famous body will be chosen from the following works:

CLÉOPÂTRE (Mimodrame in One Act) .. ..	Arensky-Glazounov
SCHERAZADE (Drame Chorégraphique in One Act) .. ..	Rimsky-Korsakov
L'OISEAU DE FEU (Ballet Fantastique in One Act) .. ..	Strawinski
LES SYLPHIDES (Rêverie Romantique in One Tableau) .. ..	Chopin
LE CARNAVAL (Pantomime Ballet in One Act) .. ..	Schumann
LE PAVILLON D'ARMIDE .. ..	Tcherepnine
PRINCE IGOR (Danses Poloviennes) .. ..	Borodin

The principal dancers engaged are: Mlle. Tamar Karsavina (première ballerine), Mlle. Lapoukova (première danseuse classique), Mlle. Will (première danseuse), Mlle. Ida Rubinstein (première mime), Monsieur Vaslav Nijinsky (premier danseur), Monsieur Boulgakow (premier mime).

THE NEW 'GROVE' ON WELSH MUSIC.

Although some of the statements by Mr. Frank Kidson in the February issue of this journal seem to demand more or less notice, prolonged controversy on the question is beyond my present purpose—even if the continued liberality of the editor in the matter of space may be counted upon. That there is much to be said and done, and possibly unsaid and undone, in connection with the subject is a fact that will be acknowledged by enlightened Welsh musical opinion generally; and the 'native of the Principality' who, according to Mr. Kidson, is 'inclined to resent any attempt to set things right' may be treated largely as a negligible quantity.

It was declared by the present writer in the Musical Times for November last—a declaration which holds good—that the Welsh people could have no desire to retain as their own melodies which could be proved to be another nation's property, but that each claim made should, nevertheless, be thoroughly examined and tested. No more effective way of inducing the 'inclination to resent,' alluded to, could well be devised than to advance ill-supported and far-fetched claims to melodies that have long been recognized as Welsh. This rule has not always been observed; and if a certain amount of distrust has resulted, that may serve at least as an explanation.

The 'Bells of Aberdovey' has figured somewhat prominently in this discussion, and in support of the contention that the air was Charles Dibdin's own composition Mr. Kidson advances the argument that it was 'quite opposed' to Dibdin's practice to use existing tunes in his operas (vide Grove)—emphasizing the statement in the Musical Times for February, by quoting the title-page of the opera, 'Liberty Hall,' which 'expressly' states that the whole work was 'entirely an original composition by Mr. Dibdin.' As a theory that looks fair enough, and only requires to be supported by facts; and here I beg to record my deep indebtedness to Mrs. Mary Davies, whose observant eye has discovered another Welsh travesty in the self-same 'entirely original' opera, sung by the same comic character, Ap Hugh,

'Were patience kind to me,' a song containing the refrain, 'Oh, he, de, nos,' an evident parody of 'Ar hyd y nos' ('All through the night'). Here we find the following:

that reproduces the middle part of 'Ar hyd y nos' note for note, practically speaking, and no further comment is needed to demonstrate how effectually it demolishes the little theoretical structure put together above. It may be as well to add, perhaps, that 'Ar hyd y nos' had been previously published—in Edward Jones's 'Musical Relicks,' 1784.

In regard to the 'Bells of Aberdovey' itself, an examination of the Dibdin copy shows that there is absolutely no resemblance between the two airs; excepting the last two lines (four bars), which are repeated, besides a few chordal suggestions. This again carries its plain verdict, to my thinking, without any need to labour it further. Other similar instances may be cited, but no more striking object-lesson is required than that furnished by the 'Queen Dido' examples in Mr. Kidson's article in the Musical Times for February. Indeed one almost hesitates to suppose that these are intended to represent the same air fundamentally, inasmuch as no similarity, rhythmic, melodic or any other, is traceable, with the exception of some half a dozen notes which form a very stereotyped middle cadence, and half that number for a final close. Apropos the 'Bells' once more, the self-evident reply to the query that 'if the air be Welsh, why was it not included in any Welsh collection prior to 1844?' is another query: Why were the forty-and-one other airs published by Miss Williams for the first time, and the large number still being unearthed by others, not published before? Miss Williams's footnote to this air, that its origin was unknown, is capable of more than one explanation—without suggesting any doubt respecting that highly esteemed lady's literary probity. Even as it is the note is quite as 'explicit' as some of the others—'A Christmas carol,' for instance.

It may be pointed out to Mr. Kidson that the 'Cerdor Cymreig' was not a 'historical' but a musical journal, as the title, which means 'Welsh Musician,' indicates; and it is to be wished that the editor, who was an able man, had undertaken to 'expose and explode certain myths' created by tradition or the imaginative faculties of collectors and editors of the bardic school. This might have helped to advance the cause of 'saner views,' whether 'from an English point of view' or another, by some years. To say that one has spoken of the 'characteristics of Welsh music' is not a very serious impeachment; nevertheless, the writer fails to discover any mention of it in his November article. And my reference to Dibdin's songs distinctly specified collections of the 'Songs of England' containing some of his composition.

Church and Organ Music.

THE ORGANIST'S POSITION.

We have just read in the Monthly Report of the Incorporated Society of Musicians an article on 'The organist's disabilities,' which may be said to present the question in a sensible and dispassionate manner. To organists, the questions of their artistic and social position, their remuneration, and the conditions under which their work is done, are too often a source of dissatisfaction, producing a sense of injustice. This is far too often met by those in authority over them with the remark that the organist is necessarily a highly strung individual. We at once brush this aside as being untrue, however convenient it may be to those who take refuge behind it. The average organist has the same feelings of self-respect and enthusiasm for his work as anyone in any walk of life. He asks so little in reality, his greatest demand being that he should be trusted to do his work without interference. That his position as a leading musician in his own district should be recognized depends, of course, upon his industry outside the sphere of his actual church work, though this has some bearing upon his general success.

We suppose no organist would dispute the just authority of his vicar; but the fact of his having no legal position is surely a state of things which in itself is enough to daunt a man, however zealous he may be. It will be remembered that at the recent meeting of Convocation much controversy took place as to the wisdom of making retirement of the clergy compulsory at a certain age. We think that not only the clergyman, but the organist, too, should be allowed to work as long as his strength permits him. There is, unfortunately, no pension fund to which an organist may look for aid when his power for work is gone, though Sir Frederick Bridge's admirable scheme, the Organists' Benevolent League, if it received the support it certainly deserves, would be a refuge and comfort to many, and might in time become a self-supporting institution. But it is not only the question of age which too often throws a man upon the world. There have been too many cases of an organist who, having worked well for years with his vicar, is, on the latter's death or preferment, asked to resign in favour of another man. We do not say that an organist should be appointed for life, but surely it is the minimum of justice to ask that he should have the right of appeal in cases of this sort, and possess some security against unmerited dismissal.

Regarding the generally small salary given to organists, there can, we fear, be little hope of improvement so long as the Cathedral organist's average stipend can be taken as a standard. Indeed, so small is the latter, that it is in some cases exceeded in ordinary churches.

In a letter from a 'Church Organist,' inspired by the article to which we refer, the writer says, rightly: 'Very few organists, I imagine, would think of measuring out their work at so much per hour.'

The fact is that it is difficult to make a living by any art; and when, as in the case of the church organist, a man is expected to regard his salary as a retaining fee, entitling his employer to call upon him at any time, he must live in a constant state of uncertainty.

Many an organist finds satisfaction in his work for its own sake, such as the getting up of oratorios, giving recitals, and the like; but though these functions and services often largely benefit the many funds controlled by the church, and rightly so, it seems to us that such labour as must in these cases be bestowed by the organist is hardly rewarded by his usually meagre salary. In the face of Easter offerings to the clergy, we really wonder that nothing has been done towards a similar recognition of the organist. Music has been, is, and we hope will remain such an important adjunct to religion that we do not apologize for our attitude on behalf of those who are the musical experts of our numerous churches. We fear that the qualities other than musical proficiency possessed by the cultured organist of the present day are too often overlooked. He has not merely to play his instrument, for that indeed is a relatively small part of his equipment. It is in the management of the boys, his tactful dealing with the men, and the many side-issues of his work, that his chief value lies. And let us not be mistaken. The man who fails in these points, and whose failure of course reflects itself in the musical part of the service, should not be tolerated. We were once appealed to by a man to support his candidature for an important post, not because he cared about religion or church music, but because the organ was a fine one! Our contemporary emphasizes many points in favour of the organist, as we have done, but says nothing in support of the complaint one hears from the clergy. They often assert that the organist is a 'grumbler.' This may be so in many cases, but the genus may be found in places other than churches, and there may be reason for 'grumbles' in any position in life. We have given several reasons which might excuse an organist's dissatisfaction with his lot; but he should see to it that he does his duty to his utmost power, striving to win the esteem and confidence of those under whom he has to labour. A significant point is that an organist to-day always avoids his own profession when choosing his son's career. But the large number of young and brilliant men who are turned out by our musical institutions proves that the life of an organist still has its attractions. Let us hope that the culture of music, now so widely distributed, will shortly become part of the education of the clergy as a body, as it is in many individual cases. The result will be a better understanding between them and those they employ, and mutual concessions on a matter which so closely concerns both.

The annual meetings of the Free Church Musicians' Union were held in the London Road Baptist Church, Portsmouth, on March 8. The president, Dr. Keighley, was unavoidably prevented from attending. It was decided to hold the next annual gathering in Birmingham, and Dr. Coward was elected president for 1912. The secretary, Mr. H. F. Nicholls, and treasurer, Mr. J. E. Leah, were re-elected. A public conference in the evening was presided over by Mr. Horace Holmes, of London, and addresses were given by Dr. Leonard Fowles and Rev. E. P. Powell, of Wellingborough.

CHOIR APPOINTMENT.

- Mr. Reginald Hale, bass-baritone, St. Paul's, Camden Square, N.W.

Reviews.

Serenade for small orchestra. By Percy Pitt. Arranged for pianoforte solo by the composer.

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

Mr. Pitt's Serenade was one of the successes of the last season of 'Promenades.' The reason is not far to seek. From beginning to end it is bright, melodious and rhythmic, as befits a 'serenade.' The ideas are of a class that appeal to all without being the reflection of familiar commonplaces, and with his fluent inventive faculty the composer always contrives to 'keep the game alive.' There are five well-contrasted movements entitled respectively 'Allegretto scherzando,' 'Alla marcia,' 'Intermezzo,' 'Pizzicato' and 'Alla Gavotta.' The transcriptions make pleasant and practicable pianoforte music, especially that of the Intermezzo. In its orchestral form the Serenade will doubtless obtain a vogue amongst amateur orchestras, for whose attentions it is well adapted.

SONGS.

- Five songs. Selected songs.* By Edward MacDowell.
The trusting tree. The valley of silence. By Cyril Scott (Op. 72, Nos. 2 and 3).
Two Eastern songs. By Agnes Mary Lang.
Song of the mothers. By Norman O'Neill.
 [Elkin & Co.]

It is not easy to understand why MacDowell's songs have so small a vogue in England. As a rule they are artistically designed in every respect, and it was not in the composer's nature to make them too deeply philosophical or too academic for the popular taste. There is sufficient genial warmth and intelligible melody in the above collections to make them universally attractive. The 'Five songs,' Opp. 11 and 12, are 'My love and I,' 'You love me not,' 'In the sky, where stars are glowing,' 'Night song,' and 'The chain of roses.' They are characterized by graceful rhythms and by glowing harmonies or piquant figures elaborated in the accompaniments. The latter are, however, not difficult of execution. The 'Selected songs' are 'Thy beaming eyes' (Op. 40, No. 3), 'The swan bent low' (Op. 56), 'O lovely rose' (from Op. 40), 'Deserted' (Op. 9, No. 1), 'Slumber song' (Op. 9, No. 2), and 'A maid sings light and a maid sings low' (Op. 56, No. 3). They are simple in design and less ambitious than the 'Five songs,' and on the whole less distinguished. But they do not challenge so high a standard of comparison.

The two songs by Mr. Cyril Scott named above were probably composed with very little trouble. They are interesting in that they bear the stamp of their origin at every point, but they do not command deep respect. The 'Two Eastern songs' are named 'Before the dawn' and 'Salaam.' They indicate creative talent fettered by the powerful influence of the shop-ballad. Mr. O'Neill's 'Song of the mothers,' which is adapted from his 'Blue Bird' music, with words by R. H. Elkin, has the expected refinement and musicianship, and gains by the avoidance of over-ambitious striving for effect.

Praise the Lord, O my soul. The secret of the Lord.

Anthem. By John E. West.

Te Deum and Benedictus (Men's Voices), in C. By John E. West.

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

Mr. West has contributed much to the store of Church music, and the above examples of his work confirm our opinion that he gauges most accurately the wants and capabilities of the average church choir. The standard is undoubtedly advancing, and with music of this calibre at hand, there is every encouragement to organists and choirmasters. The vocal parts are well written, and naturally easy to sing, while the organ part is always interesting and full of rhythmic and melodic figures. These points are particularly well illustrated in the first anthem, which should share an equal popularity with the second.

The difficulties of writing church music for men's voices, with their necessarily limited compass and possibilities of 'effect' have been well overcome in the above-named setting, while the independent and attractive organ part is an excellent feature. The verse in the Te Deum is reminiscent of the same point in Stanford in B flat, particularly in the accompaniment, but that may surely be forgiven. The Benedictus is a characteristic example of Mr. West's strong and vigorous method. Altogether, the examples are well worthy of the high purpose to which they are dedicated.

I will arise. Motet for five voices. By Richard Dering, edited by Sir Frederick Bridge.

[Bosworth & Co.]

Sir Frederick Bridge has done well to place the works of Dering before us, and with the added advantage of his editorship we doubt not that they will become widely known and sung. In the above example, which, from its title, may be used generally, the distribution of the vocal parts, and the accompaniments, which Dering undoubtedly intended, will commend it to many who prefer the severer school for church use. It should be added that the English text is adapted by the editor.

We are informed that the omission of numbers from the plates in the Rev. F. W. Galpin's 'Old English Instruments of Music,' pointed out in our review of the book, is due to a printer's error and is confined to the first few hundred copies, and that a second edition with the numbers is in preparation.

'OLD ENGLISH INSTRUMENTS OF MUSIC.'

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

SIR,—I am in perfect accord with your reviewer as to Mr. Galpin's most interesting and researchful volume, but there are a couple of matters that I wish to call attention to, especially as the author quotes from my 'History of Irish Music,' which he is kind enough to describe as 'as full of patriotism as it is of valuable information.'

As to the Ullard Harp, I myself examined it some twenty years ago, but I relied mainly on Sir Samuel Ferguson's description as given in 1834, as did also Dr. Petrie. The photograph evidently shows a forepillar, and the instrument I dare say may be classed as a quadrangular Cruit. However, I beg to point out that Mr. Galpin is in error in stating that the Irish Bards (no doubt he means the Irish Minstrels, not the Bards proper, who were poets, not musicians) 'adopted the harp from their music-loving neighbours'—that is, the English—in the '11th century.' As a matter of fact there is distinct mention of the Irish harp in the 9th century, and there is a beautiful representation of the instrument on the shrine of St. Moedhoe, an exquisite bronze carving of the 9th century. An Irish entry fixes the date as prior to the year 888. Again, Ottfried von Weissenberg, circa 855, a pupil of the Irish monks of St. Gall, alludes to the harp, while it must not be forgotten that Caedmon was of Celtic descent. I may also add that the Irish of the 9th century had 'harp bags' of otter skins, and surely it is well known that St. Aldhelm, Bishop of Sherborne, was taught the harp by Irish monks, as was also St. Dunstan. The Irish Tiomp (diminutive 'tiompan') gave the cue for the English Timpe, and the Dump. Nor must it be forgotten that there is mention of the Fidil in an Irish tract of the 7th century, while there is still to be seen a sculptural figure of a man playing the bowed cruit at Lough Curraue, Co. Kerry, dating from the 12th century.

In reference to the Tromba marina, regarding which there is much difference of opinion, it might have been added that Pietro Castrucci invented an instrument called the Violetta marina in 1745.

As to the Clavichord, Mr. Galpin refers to an early mention of the instrument in England in 1483, but I have found an earlier reference under date of 1477. Various are the speculations as to the origin of the word 'Virginal,' but I am of opinion that it can be traced to Virga, a jack, or quill point.

I am sorry to find Mr. Galpin giving an incorrect description of the Irish Uilleann, or Union, pipes. He says that 'in the second half of the 18th century, keys were added to the drones of the Irish pipes,' and he adds that 'before the year 1800 three of the drones had been so fitted.' It was I who first pointed out the now generally received explanation of 'Union' being an Anglicized corruption of the Irish Uilleann, and may I observe that the absurdity of deriving the name from the 'Union' period (1800) is sufficiently evidenced by reason of the fact that we have 'Union' pipes dated 1770. However, this is not the error I allude to: it is the error of writing of 'keyed drones.' There are such things as regulators or keyed chanters, but I have never heard of 'keyed drones.' Probably Mr. Galpin took the description from the card in the National Museum, Dublin, but I have since had the correction duly attended to by the courteous curator.—

Yours faithfully,
W. H. GRATTAN FLOOD.

THE STUDY OF RHYTHM.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

SIR,—The fallacious idea held by Greek thinkers about the nature of motion was, that because the space over which motion is made is divisible, so motion itself can be arbitrarily divided. From this belief arose some of the paradoxes of Zeno, including the well-known one of Achilles and the tortoise. Suppose Achilles gives the tortoise a start in a race he will never catch the tortoise, for when Achilles has reached the place where the tortoise started, the tortoise will have gone on a certain distance, and while Achilles traverses this distance, the tortoise will have proceeded farther, and so on ad infinitum. Here the fallacy lies in thinking that because we can divide the ground over which Achilles and the tortoise ran into sections, we can divide up their motion into similar sections.

The same fallacy seems to lie at the root of the rhythmic theory of Aristoxenus. Put in its modern form, the theory is that because there is a definite time-standard on which music is built, and this foundation can be split up into feet or measures by means of arsis and thesis, therefore the music that is made on this foundation can in like manner be split up into definite divisions, each of which stands for a rhythmic unit. Now, the easiest way to arrive at a solution of this question is by practical experiment. If a law is claimed, it must apply in all cases, and exceptions must be shown to be simple variations of a rule. But even a cursory examination of music, such as the air and variations of Beethoven's Sonata Op. 26, will show us that no such definite divisions in fact exist, but rather that the aim of the composer is to get an indefinite number of different rhythmic designs around the strict standard of bar and accent. Thus, while the influence of accent is felt, it is found to be impossible to divide up rhythm into definite sections according to a given law; indeed, such a division would take away from the charm of rhythm, which lies in its freedom. And so the conclusion is that we must get away from the tyranny of 'measure,' and judge each piece of music on its own merits, looking for divisions just where they occur, and not trying to read into music what in fact is not there.

Another fallacy seems to be involved in the idea that rhythm consists in the alternation of strictly defined divisions. Now, Herbert Spencer and Tyndall have shown us that in nature all motion is rhythmic, but do we always find strict divisions in natural motion?

The word 'pause' I used in my last letter was not meant to be the same as 'fermate,' but to denote a break in the rhythmic flow.—

Yours faithfully,

A CHANT BY GOSS.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

SIR,—With regard to the chant by Goss, from J. Clark, there is a paragraph in the chapter on 'Goss' in J. F. Bumpus's 'History of Cathedral Music.' He says that it is from Clark's psalm-tune, called in Goss's 'Parochial Psalmody' (1832) 'King's Norton.' In this way it bears an analogy to the arrangement by Flintoft, No. 235 in the 'Westminster Abbey Chant Book.' Its first appearance as a double chant was in the collection published by Sir J. Goss in 1841. It was included by Turler in the 'Abbey Chant Book' in the 1855 edition.—Yours faithfully,

G. H. NEWBOLD.

MEMORIAL TO JOHANN STRAUSS.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

SIR,—I read with interest in your issue for January that Sir Alexander Mackenzie has supported a fund for the erection of a monument in Vienna to Johann Strauss, 'The waltz king.' By all means let us have a monument in the town that loved him and he loved so well; but would not a more far-reaching and more widely appreciated memorial be to issue a well-edited and complete edition of his works, both in score and parts, compiled by an able and recognized authority on his music? There are so many poor editions of his waltzes, &c., badly-printed and incorrect parts that are a misery to play from, and even some of the best waltzes with the beautiful introductions cut and mutilated in a most heartless manner, that surely bandmasters and conductors would gladly welcome a correct edition with original orchestration and composer's marks. The Operettas, with a carefully translated and revised English book, would afford excellent material for many amateur dramatic clubs and societies which confine their attention solely to our own Gilbert and Sullivan.

EDWARD BEHR (Bombay).

THE NATIONALITY OF FOLK-SONGS.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

SIR,—Some years ago appeared a cartoon of a Highland piper about to play, with an Irishman standing by, grasping his shillelah, and saying: 'Just play the "Boyne Water" to see if I could stand it.' I am somewhat in the position of that piper, with Dr. Grattan Flood and his shillelah of argument standing by, but I still maintain it is very stupid for intellectual men to spend their time arguing whether a tune, of which the origin is unknown, is English, Scotch, or Irish.

Dr. Grattan Flood says very truly that the melodies of each nation have their own racial characteristics: I will also grant him that the Irish tunes, generally speaking, are the most beautiful; but those to which I allude have been so altered, and have appeared in so many shapes, that it is impossible to say which was the original. I need only refer to 'Hussey's Maggot,' which Dr. Grattan Flood gives as taken from an Irish MS. dated 1773, while Mr. Frank Kidson proves the tune in other shapes, and under other names, to have been published in England in 1749, 1750, and 1772, and to have become popular later on as 'To Rodney we will go.' Its last appearance, to Moore's 'Farewell, but whenever you welcome the hour,' I suppose clinches the argument as to its being an Irish tune, but in its earliest known form as 'The Gold Ring' it is unmistakably an English country dance.

Dr. Grattan Flood says the diligent student of folk-music will soon recognize the racial characteristics of an air, even in a varied guise. Yes! but each student recognizes the characteristics he is hoping to find, and in Dr. Grattan Flood's eyes the guise is invariably Irish.—Yours faithfully,

JAMES F. BROWNE.

CRITICISM OF MENDELSSOHN.

'Senior,' in the course of a long letter, says: 'I have been both interested and amused by the letter signed "A. Ford" in the current issue of the Musical Times. Many lovers of Mendelssohn have doubtless observed for a long time past the tendency of which your correspondent speaks.

'It is possible that Mendelssohn, the musician, may not be so wide and deep as Beethoven, Wagner, or Bruckner, &c., yet his music still seems beautiful to us; and if it be not "immortal," it is yet a comfort to hope and believe that it will last our time.

'Some of us feel that we owe Mendelssohn an almost incalculable debt of gratitude, even if, in some respects, we have now got past him.'

THE CENTRE OF SONORITY IN VOCAL MUSIC:
A SUGGESTION TO PUBLISHERS.

Mr. C. B. Mabon, of Glasgow, writes: 'May I suggest, if not for early adoption, at least for fair consideration, a slight addition to the customary method of indicating the range of songs issued in sheet form: an addition which would, I think, be of general utility to the singing public. The method referred to is to give the lowest and highest notes of a song in whatever key or keys it is published. But many songs have the same actual or relative compass, while the distribution of tone within that compass varies considerably.

'There is in music something akin to what, in physical matters, is termed the centre of gravity. This I would call the centre of sonority. While difficult of exact location in a complicated musical structure, it is by no means difficult to discover within the limits of a song-melody. One has simply to reckon the total duration (for example, in quavers, or their equivalent) allotted to each individual pitch, and to take the mean of all the figures thus obtained, the result indicating upon which note or between which semitones the centre of sonority will lie. If in any song more use is made of the upper portion of the vocal compass, the centre of sonority will naturally rise; if of the lower portion, it will fall.' Mr. Mabon suggests that this 'centre of sonority' should be indicated as well as the limits of the compass.

GUITAR MUSIC.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

DEAR SIR,—I write to ask whether among your subscribers there might be any who could help me to enlarge a collection of standard guitar music—either solos or duets for two guitars. I allude to such composers as Giuliani, Carulli, Son & Mertz, not to Madame Pratten, who only wrote for her pupils' requirements. Nearly all the good music appears to have been out of print for some time.—Yours truly,
M. C. BOSANQUET.

Obituary.

We regret to have to record the following deaths:

Mr. WILLIAM SILVER DARTER, on February 28, in London, aged seventy-one. He was head of the firms of Darter & Sons, pianoforte and music-sellers, and Darter Brothers & Company, booksellers, Cape Town. He retired from active control of the business some years ago after a long and strenuous career, and since his retirement had lived in London. He was a man of a large-hearted and generous nature, keen sympathies and a ready wit; and his genial and attractive personality was the centre of a wide circle of friends at his residence in St. John's Wood Park.

Mr. JULIUS JAMES GEORGE ZAMBRA, on February 27. Born in 1858, Mr. Zambra was a son of one of the founders of the well-known firm of opticians, For many years he was a partner of the firm of Rudall, Carte & Co. His death causes a void in the hearts of a very large circle of friends.

Mr. SAMUEL T. FROGGATT, on February 28, at Hounslow, in his seventy-eighth year. Mr. Froggatt, who was a devoted church musician, had held many appointments as organist, of which the principal were St. John's, Woodlands, Isleworth; Chalfont St. Peter's; St. Thomas-the-Martyr, Oxford; Parish Church of Welshpool; the Priory Church, Bridlington; St. Alphege, Southwark; and (his last appointment) the Parish Church, Isleworth.

Herr OTTO GOLDSCHMIDT, who for many years acted as accompanist to the late Pablo de Sarasate.

Herr EDUARD REUSS, at Dresden, on February 18. Born in New York in 1851, he became one of Liszt's prominent pupils, and throughout his life he remained faithful to the 'new German' cause. He had held a professorship of pianoforte at the Dresden Conservatoire for a number of years.

Herr NICOLAI VON WILM, at Wiesbaden. Born in Riga, on March 4, 1834, he studied at the Leipzig Conservatoire, became conductor in his native town, and in 1860 professor of pianoforte and composition at the Nicolaus Institute at St. Petersburg. In 1875 he established himself at Dresden, and later retired to Wiesbaden. He was prolific as a composer, and a writer of excellent instruction books.

BRITISH CHAMBER MUSIC.

An interesting topic—'Chamber music, with special reference to British composers and the new Phantasy Form'—was laid before a meeting of the Concert-goers' Club at the Royal Academy of Music on February 1, and discussed by the man best qualified to do so, Mr. Walter W. Cobbett. He explained how the new form attracted his attention some five years ago, and continued:

'I reflected that in literature there are the lyric and the epic poem, the short story and the long novel; in the orchestra, besides the symphony, the overture and the symphonic poem; but that in chamber music there is only one form that counts. . . . And I concluded that a new type suited to the needs of the chamber-music composer was needed. I should like to add that no revolt against convention was ever intended by me—not even the substitution of one convention for another. . . . Sonata form will always remain to lovers of absolute music the most serviceable of musical structures. I would rather say that a new convention is wanted to stand side by side with the old one; which, though conceived on a less ambitious scale, is yet deemed worthy of academic sanction.'

Mr. Cobbett then dealt with the origins of British chamber music. 'The Fancies' for viols, which were the prevalent form of chamber music at the beginning of the 17th century, were, he said, an evolution of vocal music caused by the necessity of supporting the voices with instrumental doubling. He traced the growing demand for music to be played by viols and the supply in the form of Fancies, of which an example by Purcell was played. After Purcell's death, the Fancies died out. Mr. Cobbett said it was part of his scheme to try to revive them in terms of modern music. A competition was organized in connection with the Musicians' Company, and prizes were offered for Phantasy Quartets for two violins, viola, and violoncello.—It was stipulated that the Phantasy was to be performed without a break, and to consist of sections varying in tempo and rhythm; in short, to be (like the Fancies) in one-movement form and not to last more than twelve minutes. The parts were to be of equal importance.'

Sixty-seven compositions were received and the eight best submitted to Sir Alexander Mackenzie.

The prize-winners were:—W. Y. Hurlstone (first), Frank Bridge, Haydn Wood, James Friskin, Waldo Warner, and Joseph Holbrooke. 'All these works,' the lecturer said, 'were published through the kindness of Mr. Alfred Littleton, present master of the Musicians' Company, at less than cost price, by Messrs. Novello & Co.' The winning Phantasy by Hurlstone was then played. Mr. Cobbett expressed discuratively some interesting ideas suggested by the competition.

In 1907, at a further competition instituted by the Musicians' Company, the subject was a Phantasy Trio for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, and the number sent in was again sixty-seven. Dr. Cummings was among the judges. 'The prize-winners were Frank Bridge, placed first; James Friskin, second; and John Ireland, third; supplementary prizes being gained by Mrs. Alice Verne-Bredt (member of a remarkable musical family which includes four ladies who have won distinction in the musical world), Mrs. Henry Gibson, J. A. Harrison, Dr. Blair, Sidney Goldsmith, Harold R. White, and Ernest Halsey. Mr. Bridge's Trio is of remarkable beauty and brilliancy, and stamps him as one of our foremost composers for the chamber. With a lavishness to which I can recall few precedents, he has provided thematic material more than sufficient for a lengthy work in sonata form. Packed as it is with interesting matter, it stands the greatest of tests, that of frequent repetition. It was played, inter alia, at a banquet of the Incorporated Society of Musicians with great success.' It had been so often publicly performed that Mr. Cobbett thought it better on this occasion for Mr. Bridge's Phantasy Pianoforte Quartet to be played as an illustration of Mr. Bridge's style.

At the third competition, instituted by Mr. Cobbett alone in 1909 and thrown open to composers of all nationalities, the subject was a Sonata for violin and pianoforte. One hundred and thirty-four MSS. were submitted—just double the number attracted by each of the preceding competitions. The first prize was awarded to John Ireland, the second to Eric Gritton, the third to Geoffrey O'Connor Morris, and the fourth to Mrs. Henry Gibson. 'As you see,' Mr. Cobbett said, 'native composers were successful in every instance, but I am not one to raise the cry of chancieer on that account. On the contrary, it was a source of regret to all the judges that every sonata of sterling excellence coming from abroad had some disqualifying feature.'

Mr. Cobbett then told the audience that, pursuing his object of founding, with works composed in Phantasy form, a library representative of the younger School of British composers, he had commissioned, offering a suitable honorarium, the following works:

A Phantasy for pianoforte quartet .. ..	Frank Bridge.
A Phantasy for viola and pianoforte .. ..	B. J. Dale.
A Phantasy for violoncello and pianoforte .. ..	B. Walton O'Donnell.
A Pianoforte quintet .. ..	James Friskin.
A String quintet (two violas)	Dr. Vaughan Williams.
A Clarinet quintet .. ..	Mr. Donald F. Tovey.
A Pianoforte quintet* (two cellos) .. ..	Mr. Richard Walthew.
A String quintet (two cellos)	Mr. J. B. McEwen.
A Phantasy for violin and pianoforte .. ..	Mr. York Bowen.
A Trio for pianoforte, violin, and viola .. ..	Mr. Thos. Dunhill.
A Phantasy for two violins and pianoforte .. ..	Miss Ethel Barns.

The first four of these commissions, Mr. Cobbett said, had been executed.

In giving his general conclusions derived from the works submitted in the competition he said: 'The major number of the Phantasies so far composed have consisted of a sort of condensation of the scope of four movements, treated not less organically than in sonata form. In place of the development section, a movement of slower tempo is sometimes introduced, and this again may embody a movement of a Scherzando type. In any case the music is continuous, and a logical connection is maintained. A return to the characteristics of the first part of the movement is made, but not necessarily a definite repetition, and a developed Coda is added, which as regards style and tempo might suggest the usual Finale of a four-movement work. Thus the essential characteristics of an ordinary chamber work may be embodied in one movement of moderate length.'

The programme of music also included Mr. Friskin's Phantasy Pianoforte quintet. The artists were Mr. Tom Morris and Mr. H. Kinze (violin), Mr. Frank Bridge (viola), Mr. Cedric Sharp (violoncello), and Mr. Harold Samuel (pianoforte). Sir Lawrence Alma Tadema was in the chair.

ORGAN ACCOMPANIMENTS.

PAPER READ BY DR. H. W. RICHARDS.

At a meeting of the Incorporated Society of Musicians, held on February 11, Dr. H. W. Richards read a paper on 'Organ accompaniments of anthems and settings of the canticles.' The substance of his remarks was as follows:

In modern works, accompaniments are written out with full directions and little is therefore left to the taste and discretion of the organist; but up to and including the period of Handel and Bach only a figured bass was supplied, the interpretation of which demanded harmonic skill and historical knowledge. The best services and anthems of this older school have in modern times been edited with full accompaniments; but Church authorities do not adhere to one composer or period, and the organist's musicianship, sense of appropriateness and adaptability are called into play.

In the practical discussion of the organist's work as accompanist, the prelude to the anthem demands the first attention. Its performance, though extempore, presupposes considerable study and experience, if it is to be better than a vague, experimental string of chords. The prelude should spring from a musical idea borrowed from the anthem, should conform to the style of the anthem, should be logical in construction, properly rhythmic and accentuated. The inexperienced extemporizer should prepare and write out his prelude in full. Later he should learn to rely upon a bare indication of its course, and so by gradual reduction teach himself to dispense with a preconceived plan. Many players make the mistake of plodding on with each hand full of notes, which progress in a haphazard way; whereas nothing is more refreshing than to hear the number of parts reduced occasionally to two or three. As much experience is required to know what to omit as to know what to fill in. No amount of stop-changing will take the place of variety inherent in the music itself. Modulation should be within bounds, and the final key should be that of the coming anthem, or its dominant.

Unaccompanied vocal passages are a welcome relief. It may be necessary to play with the voices when signs of flattening are noticed, but this should be done the moment the symptoms appear, and not left until the voices are already flat—that is, until it is too late.

Such suggestions for registration as 'Full Swell,' 'Full organ,' 'Add full reeds,' &c., often make it evident that the composer has evolved his scheme of registration without thought, or with a small chamber organ in his mind. If such directions were carried out to the letter, the voices would be completely drowned. On the other hand, such directions as those supplied with Wesley's 'Blessed be the God and Father' are a model, and should be adhered to. The changing of single stops with the hand should not be effected at the expense of completeness in the accompaniment, or in such a way as to embarrass the singers.

In general the organ part should be subservient to and accompany the voices, but at times it may legitimately assert itself, as for instance during broad unison vocal passages, and of course in passages for organ alone. As regards expression: formerly 'soft' and 'loud' were the only terms used, but in the more modern emotional style expression-marks abound ad nauseam. These need not be exaggerated. The highly descriptive organist is only too well known.

Dr. Richards supplied, at the pianoforte, many illustrations of the points raised in his paper, choosing as examples the accompaniments to well-known anthems. Dr. Cummings was chairman of the meeting.

SONGS THAT HAVE MADE HISTORY.

A LECTURE BY SIR ERNEST CLARKE.

Sir Ernest Clarke, the Chairman of the Committee of the Folk-Song Society, delivered before the London section of the Incorporated Society of Musicians, on Saturday, March 11, a vivacious lecture on 'Songs that have made History,' which attracted an interested audience. The lecture was musically illustrated by several songs, rendered in a spirited manner by Mr. Arthur Barlow, and by a number of melodies played on the pianoforte by Mr. Frank Idle, who proved a deft accompanist, and admirably seconded the lecturer's efforts to entertain his listeners.

Sir Ernest disarmed criticism at the outset by saying that some, at any rate, of the songs with whose origin and history he proposed to deal might be better described as songs that history has made; but as it was often difficult to differentiate cause and effect, he trusted he might be held excused.

It happened to most people that certain melodies were indissolubly associated with happenings in their own private lives—their childhood, adolescence, time of romance, and joys and griefs of mature years. It was the same with nations. They might wonder why airs which seemed to modern tastes bizarre or commonplace should have stirred men's hearts to the extent that historians assured them was the case; but they had to remember that they could not now reproduce the environment of the times in which the melodies in question became popular or famous. He quoted from one of John Henry Newman's University sermons as to melodies 'which have escaped from some higher sphere, and are the outpourings of eternal harmony in the medium of created sound. Something they are besides themselves, which we cannot compass, which we cannot utter: though mortal man, and he perhaps not otherwise distinguished from his fellows, has the gift of eliciting them.' This last phrase brought him to a point that, he said, was of real and curious importance in connection with songs that had made history, viz., that they were, more often than not, written and composed by individuals who had left no other footprints in the sands of time, and who had no other claim to immortality than the particular lyrics which had 'caught on' under circumstances of which they could now form only a very imperfect conception.

The lecturer took for his first illustration the song which Joseph Ritson said was 'the most famous and popular air ever heard of in this country,' viz., 'When the King enjoys his own again.' The words were by the most celebrated ballad-maker of Stuart times, Martin Parker, but no one knew who composed the tune. Invented to support the then declining interests of Charles I., it served afterwards to keep up the spirits of the Cavaliers during the Commonwealth and to promote the Restoration of Charles II. At the Revolution of 1688 it remained a favourite of the adherents of the exiled family, and fed the enthusiasm of the Jacobites almost to the reign of George III.

The Welsh national songs, 'Morva Rhyddlan' (of great antiquity) and the modern 'Land of my fathers' (words by Evan James, music by James James), were next referred to and musically illustrated. The Scottish melodies, 'Hey tuttie taitie,' to which Burns wrote 'Scots wha' hae,' and various Jacobite airs, including Caroline Lady Nairne's 'The hundred pipers,' were then discussed; and Sir Ernest explained that when Victor Hugo referred in his 'Travailleurs de la Mer' to the tristesse of 'Bonnie Dundee,' he meant the old, slow air of that name found in the Skene manuscript of 1635, under the title of 'Adew Dundie,' and not, of course, the sprightly 'Bonnets of Bonnie Dundee.' The original name of this last was the 'Baillie's daughter of Bonnie Dundee,' to the air of which Sir Walter Scott had written his stirring verses. The 'Bonnets of Bonnie Dundee' was played by Mr. Idle in the fashion that was popular two generations ago, when our grandmothers used it as a show piece on the pianoforte, as 'the band at a distance,' beginning pianissimo, working up to fortissimo, and then dying away as the band was supposed to have marched out of hearing.

Much attention was devoted to Irish melodies, and to the charming lyrics of Thomas Moore. 'The last rose of Summer' (to the tune of the 'Groves of Blarney'), 'The minstrel boy' (to the tune of 'The Moreen'), and 'The harp that once through Tara's halls' (to the tune of 'Gramachree') were cited as familiar specimens of Moore's exceptional powers of grafting effective words on to rousing tunes. A very taking air was 'Let Erin remember,' known to modern concert-goers through Arthur Somervell's adaptation of it for his delightful song 'The little red fox.' There was another song of Moore's, called 'Farewell, but when'er you remember the hour,' directed to be sung to a tune called 'Moll Rooney.' The history of this air was traced in detail by the lecturer, who recited with evident gusto some of the lines of Samuel Lover's 'Low-backed car,' its latest development. The origin of the 'Star-spangled banner' was next ingeniously worked in, and it was shown how John Stafford Smith's air for 'Anacreon in heaven,' composed before 1788 for a London convivial club of which he was a member, was utilized in 1814 by Francis Scott Key, of Baltimore, U.S.A., for the poem that is now the most generally known and esteemed American patriotic song. It was finely rendered by Mr. Barlow.

'Yankee Doodle,' and 'Hail, Columbia,' were touched upon, and then the enormous output of 'coon' or plantation songs, supposed to reflect the sorrows and aspirations of the slaves whose emancipation was so stubbornly fought for during the American Civil War, especially the federal favourite, 'John Brown's body,' and 'I wish I was in Dixie,' the great marching-song of the Confederates and to this day passionately beloved by Southerners.

The group of French Revolutionary songs was next dealt with in considerable detail. 'La Marseillaise' (composed and first performed at Strasburg in 1792); 'Mabrouk s'en va t'en guerre' (believed to have been written after Marlborough's victory at Malplaquet in 1709, but made popular in France by its being used by Queen Marie Antoinette as a lullaby for the baby Dauphin in 1781), and 'Le carillon national' (composed by a side-drummer of the Paris Opéra, and often played by the Queen on the harpsichord). The last-named tune was afterwards taken by the revolutionaries as the air for the song 'Ça ira,' which was the accompaniment of the public executions in which the maddened crowds took so much savage delight. Closely associated with 'Ça ira' in the mad dances and orgies of the Terror was 'La carmagnole,' the refrain of a blood-thirsty song called 'Madame Veto' (a nickname given to the Queen in view of Louis XVI. having so frequently vetoed the decrees of the Assembly).

Crossing the frontier, stress was laid upon the fact that the River Rhine had always been a cause of contention between the two great powers of France and Germany. Nicolaus Becker's poem of two generations ago, 'Ah! they shall never have thee, thou fair and German Rhine,' which almost every contemporary German composer had set to music, was quoted, with the taunting French reply to it by Alfred de Musset, 'Nous l'avons eu, votre Rhin allemand.' But this and other patriotic songs, such as Körner's 'Battle song' and Moritz Arndt's 'What is the German Fatherland,' were all put into the shade as popular favourites during the great struggle of 1870. Thirty years before that a quiet and obscure Swabian merchant named Max Schneckenberger, who never did anything else to merit notice, and who died in 1849, in the fortieth year of his age, wrote the words of 'Die Wacht am Rhein.' Although several composers had set Schneckenberger's song to music, it was not until 1854, when a version by Carl Wilhelm appeared, that it became really popular. The Franco-German War of 1870-1, however, gave it an enormous vogue, and it was then adopted as the national hymn of United Germany.

Some further illustrations from Belgium ('La Brabançonne'), Denmark ('Patriotic song' of 1820), Hungary (the 'Rakoczy March'), Italy ('Daghele avanti un passo'), South Africa (the Boer national Volksleid), having been passed in review, the lecturer gave, as what he styled 'a recession,' Dr. John Bull's Galliard, which he said 'contained the germs of a song that has perhaps made more history than any heard to-night, and that we all trust may be for ever the most cherished heritage of a united British Empire on which the sun will never set': and with this foreshadowing of our National Anthem he brought a much applauded lecture to an end.

A cordial vote of thanks to Sir Ernest Clarke, and his collaborators, Messrs. Barlow and Idle, was proposed by the chairman, Dr. C. J. Frost, and seconded by Dr. W. H. Cummings, and carried by acclamation.

THE OUTLOOK AND TREND OF MUSIC IN WALES TO-DAY.

By DR. DAVID THOMAS.

The following is the substance of a lecture delivered recently by Dr. Thomas before the Swansea Cymmrodion Society. He said:

The subject of my lecture ought to make a direct appeal to all well-wishers of music in the Principality. I may be wrong, but I believe that the time has come for action, for boldness, daring and enterprise in the world of Welsh music. We long to try our strength with greater factors. New methods (so far as Wales, at any rate, is concerned) of expression have to be discovered, and a new and deeper significance must be poured into the utterances of the men of the future.

The question naturally rises, 'Is Wales taking advantage of all the beneficial influences surrounding her? Do her musicians feel their responsibility to their privileges and endeavour to move forward with their confrères in England, France and Germany; with Russia, Italy and America?'

I am afraid the answer to these questions, speaking generally for the average Welsh musician, is in the negative; but speaking for individual cases, for men who have only the guiding star of their 'ideals' to lead them, men who are 'toiling upward through the night,' in the hope some day of bringing the whole mass of Welsh musicians to new and higher paths—for these the answer is in the affirmative. They are taking advantage of their opportunities; they are imbibing the modern spirit. One thing is certain, we are not going to attempt such futilities as writing a Welsh 'Messiah,' a Welsh 'Don Giovanni,' or a Welsh 'Jupiter Symphony,' even if we had the genius of Handel or Mozart. But a Welsh 'Parsifal,' a Welsh 'Elektra,' a Welsh 'Tod und Verklärung'—yes!

The greatest and most gifted musician Wales has yet produced gave us a Welsh 'Messiah' and a Welsh 'Don Giovanni.' I refer to Dr. Joseph Parry's 'Emmanuel' and his opera 'Blodwen.' Imagine the stupidity of any man to-day adopting the style and design of Dr. Parry, and hoping with Handelian fugues and Mozartian arias to 'get there,' as the Americans say! In that style there is no living Welshman that I know of who could quite be his equal (certainly not surpass him). That being the case, why will our composers look back and long to beat him at his own game? We want to move on. It is sheer 'marking time' to turn out reams of music reflecting only the Handelian and Mozartian turn of phrase and idiom. The Welsh public showed instinctively their musical proclivities by the way they took Dr. Parry's music to their hearts. Had I lived in his day (I was his pupil for two or three terms) and had not been brought into contact at an early period with Wagnerian opera and music-drama, I can well imagine I should have been just as easily captivated by the melodies that flowed from his heart. Whether Dr. Parry touched a more hidden string, sounded deeper notes, is another matter. Did he ever, for a moment, play on the heart-strings of humanity, of men of every clime, language and creed? Ah! that is what we are waiting for in Welsh music. It is too parochial and narrow. The heart of the world has never been moved by our music. That is why they know nothing about our music. The cry of 'Wales for the Welsh' may be a sound doctrine in many matters, but it will never do as a motto for Welsh art. That Welsh music, genuine, large-souled and heart-felt, will always reflect the Welsh temperament is natural and to be welcomed, but its message must be for Man.

[Dr. Thomas then referred to the pioneers of Welsh music, John Ambrose Lloyd (1821-1874), John Owen (Owain) Alan (1821-1883), and the Rev. Edward Stephens (Tanymarian).] These men had to start with an instrumental idiom, in the case of Tanymarian, on a level with the first essays of Purcell in England, or Lulli in France, and these pioneers of the musical revival in Wales were starting at the point where a century-and-a-half or more before English and even Italian musicians had left off. They were learning the mere elements of musical composition when already England had produced a Tallis, a Byrd, a Wilbye, a Gibbons, a Purcell, Webbe, Wesley and Bennett. Germany had had an early school of Luther's time, and later, after a period of stagnation in some respects, had burst into vigorous life again with Bach, Handel, Mozart, Weber, Wagner and Schumann. Austria had given Haydn and Schubert; the Netherlands Beethoven. 'Tristan and Isolde,' that blaze of original love-music, which after forty years still seems like the last word on this passion of our natures, had been written before Owain Alan penned his 'Jeremiah'; English musicians had been flourishing with a European reputation since the 15th and 16th centuries, and, in consequence, England had great artistic traditions, whereas Wales had none, for no Welsh musician prior to 1851 (only sixty years ago) had attempted anything beyond the hymn tune or the crude anthem. When we bear these facts in mind, and find, in only twenty-five or thirty years later, Wales producing a composer who could pen works like 'Emmanuel' and 'Blodwen,' we have to admit, if we are honest, that Wales had made very rapid strides. To bring the advance down to the present day, it has been pointed out by leading critics of the English Press that Welsh music is now being brought up to the plane of that of other nations. But Wales has not yet had much time to command technique alone, as she only started so recently. There has been hardly time enough for establishing a distinctive school of Welsh music, no time for establishing tradition and a critical public tribunal of art. It would be no exaggeration to say that, fond as they are of singing, the great mass of the people are incapable of discriminating between good and bad music. Wales is a small country, and consequently her men of talent are more likely to be isolated in point of time than would be the case in England.

I believe I am justified in stating the present outlook is a very bright one. The equipment of the leaders of to-day is, on an average, considerably above that of the past generation. The vastly increased proficiency of our orchestras, instrumentalists, organists and conductors is sufficient guarantee that Wales is stirring in the right direction. The average capacity of our singers is higher than in the past. More difficult and advanced compositions can be expected to have adequate interpretation at the hands of our conductors and executive artists. All this advance in executive ability is bound to react on the creative faculties of composers.

But so far as the average output of composition goes, it is not nearly broad enough. Some of our younger generation of composers are for ever turning their attention to the anthem and the part-song. Nothing else seems to come within their line of vision. Even in the more extended forms of the cantata, we find the choral treatment is bound by the part-song, or the fugue. It is this stereotyped treatment of the chorus that we want to get away from. Art is a very hard mistress. Her watchword seems to be 'Work, work, work: study, study, study.' Now, once a man has learned to construct a fugue he is a terrible individual to let loose on the world. He is like the man with a grievance—his friends are always treated to it. It is fugue for breakfast, lunch and dinner. We want fresh menus and cleverer cooks to entice us to a feast of music. There are, however, men who have seen this necessity of breaking away from the old methods. The treatment of the chorus is far more elastic in their hands than with their predecessors. The interlacing of orchestral ideas, all organically resolved, with the choral stream, all tends to differentiate the present-day works of Welsh musicians from the past.

I now come to a matter of deep significance, as it is touching the spirit of the age and the reflex action of this on the trend of our music. To start with, it is no use disguising the fact that we in Wales are becoming more and more aware of a force that is freeing our musicians in their choice of subjects for musical treatment. One fact stands out, and that is that the dramatic instinct of Welshmen is going to fight for existence. But the dramatic art is not a matter of instinct only. It also has its technical difficulties, and experience alone can give us the opportunity of learning the tools of the art. The Welsh composer therefore will be driven to turning out conventional cantatas and oratorios unless some measure of sympathy is shown to his proper bent, namely, some histrionic presentation of his dreams and ideas. Everything in the latest productions of Welsh musicians seems to cry out for this adjunct.

Some will say, Never, as long as the Puritanic prejudice against the stage remains as it is in Wales to-day. Well, I am going to make my appeal to the heart and core of the nation's cherished institution, the Eisteddfod, to start with. I believe when the matter is brought home by addresses, say at either the next or following Eisteddfod, by men of experience and love for this cause, that if, with the co-operation of the Eisteddfod during its visits to large towns, like Swansea, Cardiff, Liverpool or Wrexham, a number of music-dramas by Welsh composers (in the Welsh language) could be staged, we would start a new 'era' in our National music. In any case, the matter could be discussed and a scheme evolved.

Then comes the question of librettists in the Welsh tongue. I am a firm believer in the Welsh language as a fit vehicle of expression in drama. What we want are the right men to play on the instrument.

Following in the wake—incidentally—there would be a fresh outlet to the Welsh singer. Powers that are now allowed to lie dormant would be awakened to life and action. Powers of interpretation, of characterization and expression would be called into play. Mere vocalization, mere 'ahing' and 'ohing' and 'ooing' would no longer hold sway as it has done in the past; we should want real, live men, men of reading, men of intellectual grasp and of individuality, to do justice to the parts in the music allotted to them. They would have to learn control over their feelings, even when portraying them deeply. They would learn a lesson sadly wanted by many singers, to appreciate and understand an orchestral accompaniment; to be one with it, and not be the great 'I am' before it; to understand how much greater an artist is when he submerges his idiosyncrasies to the unit of the dramatist's ideal, than when standing on a pedestal looking down with an air of cold disdain on a mere fiddler. The day of the fiddler has come in Wales!

SERVICE MUSIC FOR THE CORONATION.

The music to be given in connection with the great ceremony of the Coronation is now officially settled. All the musical arrangements will be under the directorship of Sir Frederick Bridge. The choir will consist of over 400 performers, selected from the leading Cathedral and other church choirs, and there will be a full orchestra. Dr. W. G. Alcock will be at the organ. As will be seen from the list given below, all the music to be included, except 'Zadok the Priest' is by British composers:

The Service-book will be published shortly by Messrs. Novello & Co.

We understand that Sir Alexander Mackenzie and Sir Edward Elgar are writing orchestral marches to be used during the processions.

By the time this appears Mr. Ernst Denhof's season of performances of 'Der Ring des Nibelungen' will have commenced at Leeds. As announced in our last issue, the other performances will be given at Manchester and Glasgow. The dates for Manchester are April 3 (Rhinegold), April 4 (The Valkyrie), April 5 (Siegfried), and April 7 (Twilight of the Gods). The dates for Glasgow are April 11, 12, 13, 15. The conductor will be Herr Balling, whose admirable qualifications for the task were revealed at Edinburgh last year, and an excellent cast has been secured.

THE SHEFFIELD WORLD-TOUR CHOIR.

The farewell concert given by this organization at Sheffield, on March 11, was a noteworthy event in the history of a remarkable musical and, it may be claimed, national enterprise. In the afternoon the Choir assembled for its final rehearsal, and later the members and many other invited guests were entertained in the Cutlers' Hall by the genial master-cutler, Alderman George Senior. At this function the Alderman expressed his regret that he could not accompany the Choir, and he declared that he would readily give £1,000 to be able to do so. Mr. Stuart Wortley, M.P., was present, and he delivered an eloquent address in which he dwelt on the imperial importance of the tour of the Choir. He said the function of art was to record the impression of the artist in terms of emotion. The Choir was going to do this in countries of the English-speaking world all round the globe, and would use one of the most beautiful languages in speech and song. Further, they were going to use another language which appeals to civilized man wherever he is found upon the globe. 'Music speaks as no other language speaks, because wherever it goes it is a language which no cultivated ear can fail to understand. It inspires, it softens, it encourages, it excites, and above all it draws its votaries together.' He wished them all possible success, 'a success which shall render more precious even than it is now the sacred and enduring gift that has been given to mankind in what we know as music, which comforts him, and upholds him in joy and in sorrow from the beginning of his life to the end.'

The Choir consists of 66 sopranos, 52 contraltos, 42 tenors and 37 basses: total 197. It is obviously numerically weak in the bass part, but this balance was deliberately adopted by Dr. Coward because much of the music to be performed has doubled soprano parts and makes great demands upon the tenors. The Choir is not recruited wholly from Sheffield. Glasgow sends 4, Huddersfield 20, Newcastle 30, Leeds 8, Bradford 12, Newport 1, and London 4, leaving 118 chorists to come from Sheffield.

The tone of the Choir is full and resonant. The sopranos are brilliant and the tenors also are conspicuously good. The contraltos have a peculiarly blendful quality, and the basses, although deficient in deep sonority, display many excellent qualities, not the least of which are their alertness and fluency. But it is not merely on fullness and beauty of tone that the Choir will rely in making its appeal to attention. The specialities of the Choir are its highly-trained technique and interpretation. It was quite evident at the rehearsal and the concert that Dr. Coward had already brought his unique powers to bear upon the preparation of the extensive repertoire selected. This was the first day on which all the Choir had been gathered together, and there is no doubt that, as now they will have nothing else to do but to perfect themselves, they will be soon welded into a splendid unity.

The programme at the concert provided such a feast of choral music unrelieved by solos that could only be given with success before a choice Sheffield and choral expert audience. It comprised twenty-four part-songs, madrigals and choruses. The audience, which entirely filled the Albert Hall, was very appreciative.

The Choir left Liverpool for Canada in the Allan liner Victorian, on March 18. They were to give their first concert in Toronto on March 23. After touring in Canada they go to Cincinnati, and returning to Canada they cross the Pacific to Australia and New Zealand. Then they proceed to South Africa. The total distance they will travel during their six months' absence is 33,810 miles. The great choral works they will perform are 'Messiah,' 'Elijah,' 'The Dream of Gerontius,' 'The Golden Legend,' 'Sing ye to the Lord' (Bach), 'Faust' (Berlioz), 'Pan' (Dr. Charles Harriss), Beethoven's 'Choral' Symphony, Verdi's 'Requiem,' Elgar's 'Bavarian Highlands' choral suite, Parry's 'Blest Pair of Sirens,' and about forty part-songs, madrigals and glees. Most of the music is by British composers. It is a wonderful collection for one choir to be able to offer.

The tour is arranged under the auspices of Dr. Charles Harriss. It has called for immense labour on his part, and has tested his wonderful organizing power to the utmost. It will cost close upon £50,000.

All concerned will know that the progress of the Choir on its long journey will be watched with great interest in the homeland. We wish them all success and pleasure in their unique mission.

ELGAR'S A FLAT SYMPHONY IN BRUSSELS.

The Symphony in A flat was performed for the first time in Brussels on March 13, at one of the concerts of which M. Ysaye is the conductor. The performance of the Symphony was directed by the composer, to whom M. Ysaye paid a compliment by playing amongst the violins of the orchestra. The occasion was an immense popular success.

The following opinions appeared in the Belgian press: 'Whether at the height of passion or ecstasy, or at the depths of sorrow, the theme recurs, infinitely varied in its expression and in its rhythms; its contrapuntal adornments are irreproachable, and its colour-schemes always original. It is truly exalted music, well-weighed in its effects, devoid of tricks and trivialities, and of the ultra-modernisms so prevalent among younger men, whose poverty of invention and melodic banality they often serve to conceal. Here all is different; the ideas are of great beauty; they are broadly conceived and broadly developed. Engaging lyrical themes are surrounded with luxuriant, powerful and well-balanced orchestration. In short, it is a work that moves one with its fine melodic outlines, sincerity of expression and nobility of sentiment.'—La dernière heure.

'This work is written with an unerring hand, well-balanced, without a dull moment, and contains an "Adagio" which is a masterpiece of emotional poetry. In its entirety, it is a composition full of glowing sound and solidly built to a design whose component parts are clearly outlined. It is moreover conceived in the spirit of sincerity and nobility, and aspires to the highest idealism.'—Le Peuple.

'The Symphony convinces one with its accents of sincerity, with the elegance of its outlines, and with the logical sequence of its design. The picturesque variety of its effects outweighs whatever there is of overloading in the scoring and developments. Above all, it is inspired by one dominating theme—the victory of the Ideal in its struggle with the deceptive realities of daily life. The composer has, in fact, although rejecting "programme music," cast over his work an element of unified interest by means of this perfectly general idea. Again and again the melody of the Ideal—a kind of slow march, stated at the beginning of the work—rises above the conflict of passions, and finally it asserts itself amid a radiant and serene atmosphere of triumph.'—Le vingtième siècle.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

QUEEN'S HALL.

The concert given on February 23 derived more interest from the fact that it was conducted by an able young Englishman, Mr. Albert Coates, than it did from the programme, which on the whole was certainly not well-chosen. Mr. Coates has made his name as a conductor abroad, and he holds an important appointment in that capacity at St. Petersburg. His powers on this occasion were brought to bear upon two Preludes by Bach, arranged for orchestra, a Concerto for strings by Vivaldi, three pieces by modern Russian composers.—Liadov's 'Kikimora' Fantasia, Steinberg's 'Fantasia Dramatic,' and Rimsky-Korsakov's battle-music from 'Kilech.' Another item was Saint-Saëns's Pianoforte concerto, in which Mr. Alfred Cortot gave a brilliant performance of the solo part. Miss Mignon Nevada sang 'Charmant oiseau' (David). It may be hoped that on the next occasion Mr. Albert Coates conducts in London his powers will have a better chance.

The concert given on March 9 was to have been conducted by M. Vincent d'Indy, but owing to his illness his place was worthily filled by M. Safonoff. The orchestral programme included Mendelssohn's 'Midsummer-night's Dream' overture, Beethoven's C minor Symphony, and Tchaikovsky's fantasia 'Francesca da Rimini,' all of which were played with rare excellence under the Russian conductor's hands—we cannot say bâton, because he does not use one. Grieg's Pianoforte concerto in A minor was another interesting item, especially as the solo part was played by M. Raoul Pugno. Miss Ruth Vincent sang 'Dove Sono' (Mozart), and displayed the strength and beauty of her voice, but she did not reveal the full beauty of the aria.

LONDON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

QUEEN'S HALL.

Berlioz's 'Faust' was performed at the concert given on March 6. The fact that the choruses were to be sung by the Hanley Glee and Madrigal Society, a splendid body of chorists trained by Mr. John James, helped to draw an overflowing audience. The Hanley Choir displays a singularly beautiful tone and a first-rate technique. We have heard provincial choirs that possess more sonority, especially in climaxes, but never one that pleases the ear more. The soloists were Madame Donalda, Mr. Walter Hyde, Mr. Robert Burnett, and Mr. David Brazell. Dr. Richter conducted with all his customary breadth and power.

The programme book of the concert given on March 20 announced that this would be the last appearance of Dr. Richter at these concerts prior to his retirement from the concert platform. But the vast audience attracted by this prospect of a farewell were met by the satisfactory additional announcement that the great conductor would also conduct two more concerts with this Orchestra, and that the real farewell would take place on April 10. The programme on the present occasion included the 'Meistersinger' overture, the Haydn 'drum roll' Symphony, Brahms's Violin concerto, the solo part in which was finely played by Herr Bronislav Huberman, and Beethoven's eighth Symphony. All the foregoing were conducted by Dr. Richter. The comparative novelty was Hamilton Harty's tone-poem, 'With the Wild Geese,' which was conducted by the composer. This interesting and able work was produced at the last Cardiff Festival, and created a highly favourable impression, which was renewed at the present concert.

QUEEN'S HALL SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

On March 4, the Elgar Violin concerto was again brought forward, the soloist being as before, Herr Kreisler. The other items of the programme were Beethoven's C minor Symphony, two Minuets from Brahms's Serenade in D, and Strauss's 'Till Eulenspiegel,' all of which were played with clear finish under Sir Henry Wood.

On March 18, a great crowd was attracted, chiefly no doubt because Tchaikovsky's 'Pathetic' Symphony was in the programme. Sir Henry Wood's warm interpretation of this popular work is well known. Another great attraction was the appearance of Señor Pablo Casals to play the solo in Dvorák's Concerto for violon-cello. This work may not display the composer at his best, but it would have to be a very bad composition indeed that Señor Casals could not make interesting. He is a consummate artist. The concert concluded with Lalo's beautiful 'Norwegian Rhapsody.'

MR. AND THE HON. MRS. JULIAN CLIFFORD'S ORCHESTRAL CONCERT.

Mr. Julian Clifford is an able musician, who has recently increased his reputation by his success with the Harrogate Orchestra; and Mrs. Clifford (a daughter of the late Lord Henniker) is well-known as a highly accomplished professional singer. It was a bold enterprise for them to give an orchestral concert at the Queen's Hall with the London Symphony Orchestra, on February 27, but it was justified by success. The programme commenced with Mr. Clifford's overture, 'To the New Year.' The material of this effective work has been evolved from an Ode, for solo, chorus and orchestra, composed by Mr. Clifford. The adapted work displays much fertility of melodic invention, and is scored generally with skill, but it seems that in the climaxes the percussion instruments tend to drown or confuse the real music. The 'Siegfried Idyll' served to exhibit Mr. Clifford's skill as a conductor, as did also Tchaikovsky's fifth Symphony. Mrs. Clifford sang her husband's song-cycle, 'A dream of flowers,' very acceptably, Madame Blanche Marchesi sang the closing scene from 'Götterdämmerung,' and Sapellnikoff paid tribute to Liszt's memory by playing the solo part in that composer's concerto No. 1 in E flat.

THE BACH CHOIR.

Bach's Mass in B minor was given by this Choir at Queen's Hall on March 14. A contingent from the Oxford Bach Choir assisted. The performance throughout was distinguished by its appreciation. The choir never displayed much power, but the tone, intonation, and vocalization were always satisfactory, and the tempi nearly always seemed exactly fit. Dr. H. P. Allen, who is the conductor of the Society, has contrived to gain much power over his resources, and to infect them with his enthusiasm. The soloists were Madame Le Mar, Miss Dily Jones, Mr. Gervase Elwes, and Mr. J. Campbell McInnes. There was a large audience. The leader of the orchestra was Mr. C. L. Jacoby, Sir Walter Parratt was at the pianoforte, and Dr. W. H. Harris was at the organ.

THE LONDON GLEE CLUB.

Many attempts have been made in London to cultivate the singing of part-songs and other choral works of the smaller design, but the plant has generally proved too much of an exotic to flourish. Mr. Arthur Fagge has now courageously taken up the venture with the formation of the 'London Glee Club,' and is to be congratulated on the promising nature of the results he has obtained hitherto. He has collected an excellent set of voices and has gone far towards moulding them into a homogeneous body; and the singers evidently realize the importance of expression and mood. These attainments and promise of future attainments, which are an excellent beginning and as much as could be expected at so early a stage, could be examined at the Glee Club's first concert, which was given under Mr. Fagge's direction at Queen's (Small) Hall on March 11. The programme included Cornelius's 'So soft and warm' and 'The storm wind,' Elgar's 'Angelus,' Pilkington's madrigal 'The messenger of the delightful Spring' and other works, including some by Mr. Fagge himself. Three other concerts were arranged for the present season, and during their course steady progress will doubtless be made in the excellence of the singing.

To HUBERT G. WELTON, Esq., and the Members of the Woodford Choral Society.

London Concerts.

ROYAL CHORAL SOCIETY.

Elgar's 'The Dream of Gerontius' was again performed on March 1 as an Ash Wednesday celebration. The choir, to whom the music is now quite familiar, gave a confident and workmanlike interpretation. Mr. Gervase Elwes was, as usual, unapproachable in the intimacy and conviction of his reading of the part of Gerontius. The other soloists were Miss Phyllis Lett and Mr. Frederick Ranalow. Mr. H. L. Balfour was the organist and Sir Frederick Bridge conducted. The audience was very large.

THE ALEXANDRA PALACE CHORAL AND ORCHESTRAL SOCIETY.

This Society performed Berlioz's 'Faust' on February 25 under the direction of Mr. Allen Gill. In such a building as the Alexandra Palace vivid dramatic interpretation is only effective in proportion to its breadth; and wherever this restriction allowed, the choir, the orchestra and the soloists achieved some striking results. At all points the choral singing was of good quality and full of life. The solo music was capably sung by Miss Esta d'Argo, Mr. Frank Mullings, Mr. Robert Burnett and Mr. Bertram Mills.

The Handel Society, under the direction of Mr. S. Coleridge-Taylor, chose their conductor's 'Bon-bon Suite' and Haydn's 'Spring' and 'Summer' for their concert at Queen's Hall on February 28, and carried out this programme of pleasant music efficiently and attractively. The solo parts were taken by Miss Maud Willby, Mr. Leon Fastovsky and Mr. William Higley.

Mr. Coleridge-Taylor's complete trilogy 'Hiawatha' was performed on March 4 by the People's Palace Choral and Orchestral Societies, comparatively young organizations which are progressing satisfactorily under the guidance of Mr. Frank Idle. On the whole the interpretation given reached a highly creditable standard, and set an excellent example for choral bodies in the East-End to follow. The soloists were Miss Florence Holderness, Mr. Henry Turnpenney and Mr. Julien Henry.

Mr. Franco Leoni's vividly picturesque oratorio 'Golgotha' was repeated on March 7 by the Queen's Hall Choral Society under the composer's direction. The work again gave a greater impression of brilliance, for which it owed much to its exponents, than of appropriateness. The soloists were those who had previously taken part in the first production, with the substitution of Miss Maggie Teyte for Madame Ada Davies.

The Smallwood-Metcalf Choir gave an excellent selection of madrigals and part-songs at Queen's Hall on March 8. The most exacting number was Elgar's 'Go, song of mine,' the difficulties of which were encountered with courage. Miss Louise Christie, Miss Florence Giles, Mr. Harry Dearth and Mr. W. H. Squire helped to build up a long programme.

Owing to the energies of Dr. J. E. Borland the region of Bermondsey is receiving rapid musical enlightenment. On March 9, under his direction, the Bermondsey Settlement Choral and Orchestral Union performed Bach's 'St. Matthew' Passion music at the Great Central Hall. The neighbouring district of Hither Green is served by a Choral and Orchestral Society, under the same conductor, who gave Elgar's 'Light of Life' and Schubert's 'Song of Miriam' at Brownhill Road Baptist Chapel on March 11. On May 4 these two societies will join forces under Dr. Borland in a performance of Elgar's 'The Apostles.'

Mr. Nigel Harrington Balfour conducted the London Symphony Orchestra with great ability at Queen's Hall on March 13 in a programme that included Beethoven's C minor Symphony and an extract from an opera 'Westward Ho!' by Mr. Napier Miles. The latter proved interesting and effective music.

THE EDWARD MASON CHOIR.

With undiminished enthusiasm for the cause of the British composers, Mr. Edward Mason brought forward a number of works of that school in giving a concert with his choir at Queen's Hall, on March 22. The only new example was Mr. G. von Holst's setting for female choir and orchestra of three hymns from the 'Rig Veda.' Their originality is, as usual with Mr. von Holst's work, controlled by refinement and musicianship. The remainder of the programme included Mr. Arnold Bax's 'Fatherland,' produced by the Musical League in 1909; 'The Cossacks,' a vocal duet by Mr. J. D. Davis; the prologue to Dr. Ethel Smyth's 'Der Wald'; and Delius's 'Sea-drift.' The vocalists were Miss Clara Butterworth, Mr. Spencer Thomas, and Mr. Ivor Foster.

AMATEUR ORCHESTRAS.

Saint-Saëns's Pianoforte concerto in F, with Mr. Herbert Fryer as soloist, and Schumann's 'Rhenish' Symphony were the principal numbers in the programme of the concert given by the Strolling Players Orchestral Society at Queen's Hall on February 22. Songs were given by Miss Esta d'Argo. Mr. Joseph Ivinney again secured performances of high quality.

The Smoking Concert given by the Royal Amateur Orchestral Society at Queen's Hall on March 15 was distinguished by the presence of H.R.H. The Duke of Connaught. The playing of the band was, as usual, admirable. The feature of chief interest was the performance, under the composer's direction, of Sir Alexander Mackenzie's Overture 'The little minister.' The remainder of the orchestral programme was conducted by Mr. Arthur Payne. Songs were contributed by Miss Carmen Hill and Mr. Ivor Foster.

At the third of Miss Gwynne Kimpton's 'orchestral concerts for young people,' which took place at Steinway Hall on March 3, the lecturer was Dr. Percy Buck, who spoke about Form. The programme included Brahms's 'Academic' Overture and Mozart's D minor Pianoforte concerto, with Dr. Ernest Walker as soloist.

CHAMBER MUSIC.

At the meeting of the Concert-goers' Club, held at the Royal Academy of Music on February 27, a feature was the first performance in England of a Pianoforte trio, Op. 1, composed by the boy Erich Wolfgang Korngold, of whose powers some German musicians think very highly. The work certainly displays originality and occasionally conspicuous beauty. As might be expected, it lacks cohesion. Nevertheless it proves that the boy has uncommon talent. Mr. Hubert Bath's Theme and Variations for the same combination was very welcome. It deserves a much longer notice than we can give it. The executants were Mr. Richard Epstein (pianoforte), Mr. John Saunders (violin), Mr. Jacques Renard (violoncello). Mr. Bath played the pianoforte in his own trio. Miss Pitt Soper sang.

Two of the concerts given by the Classical Concert Society at Bechstein Hall come under this heading. On February 22, the Klingler Quartet brought forward Beethoven's Fugue, Op. 133 (the discarded Finale of Op. 130), and, for better understanding and appreciation, played it twice in the same programme. Mr. Charles Draper joined the string players in Brahms's Clarinet quintet. The same Quartet appeared on March 1 in a programme that included Schubert's Op. 161. The concerts given on March 8 and 15 were joint recitals; the former by Miss Susan Metcalfe (vocalist) and Mr. Leonard Borwick; and the latter by Miss Susan Metcalfe, Madame Wietrowetz and Miss Fanny Davies.

A chamber concert was given by the Royal Academy of Music at Queen's Hall on February 23. The student-compositions in the programme were a Suite for string quartet, by Mr. Greville V. Cooke, five 'Fancies' for pianoforte, by Miss Phyllis Norman Parker, and movements from a Pianoforte sonata by Miss Ethel Woodland.

The patriotic Mr. Thomas Dunhill has opened a fifth series of chamber concerts, and with praiseworthy persistency has continued to advocate the claims of British music. The following works appeared in his programmes of February 24, March 3, and March 10:

String quartet in A minor .. ..	Stanford
Quintet for strings and horn .. ..	Dunhill
String quartet in one movement ..	Balfour-Gardiner
Nocturne for horn .. ..	Oskar Borsdorf
Pianoforte trio in G .. ..	Hurlstone
Concert-studies for pianoforte ..	Harold Darke
Songs .. ..	Lady Benedict
	Edith Swebstone
	Arthur Williamson
Violoncello pieces .. ..	Dunhill
Variations for pianoforte (new) ..	Agnes Lambert
Songs .. ..	Colin Taylor
Pianoforte quartet in C minor ..	Ernest Walker
String quartet in G minor ..	Vaughan Williams
Violin sonata in D minor .. ..	Dunhill

The Strings Club gave an 'open' concert on February 27 with a programme that included Brahms's String quartet in B flat and Beethoven's String quintet in C major. Mendelssohn's String quintet in B flat was the chief number in the programme of a chamber concert given by the Royal College of Music on March 2; quartets by Beethoven (Op. 130) and Tchaikovsky (Op. 11) were played at the same institution on March 16.

Perhaps the most satisfactory feature of the month's concerts was the high proficiency and steady advance shown by the 'New' Quartet of English players at their concert given on March 7 in Æolian Hall. Glazounow's Quartet in D, Op. 70, was the most notable work in their programme. The Wesley Quartet were heard on March 15 at Bechstein Hall in Brahms's Quintet, Op. 111 (with Mr. James Lockyer) and Dohnányi's Quartet in D flat, Op. 15.

VOCAL RECITALS.

Miss Sybil Waller Lewis displayed a pleasant voice at Bechstein Hall on February 23. At Æolian Hall on the following afternoon, Mr. Plunket Greene concluded his series of lecture-recitals amid universal admiration of his powers in the double capacity; and in the evening Miss Lily Crawforth brought forward a programme of English songs.

Mr. Theodore Byard, fresh from Continental successes, gave a recital at Bechstein Hall on March 9, and carried out a programme of great heterogeneity and interest with his customary high ability and individuality. On March 9, Mr. Hamlyn Hamlyn showed commendable powers within certain limits at Messrs. Broadwood's Rooms; and Madame Maud Herlenn, singing at a Broadwood Concert, revealed decided gifts and command of effect. Miss Agnes Witting and Miss Lotte Liess gave artistic interpretations of vocal duets at Broadwood's on March 14.

Two pupils' concerts deserve to be mentioned. Seventeen vocalists trained by Mr. Charles Phillips sustained a high level of excellence at Bechstein Hall on March 14. The pupils of Mr. C. Karylle similarly carried out a programme of unusual interest at the same hall on March 16. Hardly a single item was hackneyed or undeserving.

Successful recitals, with well-chosen programmes, were given by Mrs. George Swinton at Bechstein Hall on March 16; by Miss Marie Héla at Æolian Hall on March 20; and by Miss Rhoda von Glehn at Bechstein Hall and Madame Hélène Hurner at Æolian Hall on March 21.

The programme of Mr. Denis Byndon-Ayres's recital at Æolian Hall on March 23 included ten 'first performances.' The names of the composers of the new songs were S. Coleridge-Taylor, Craigie Ross, Waddington Cooke, Hubert Bath and J. Holbrooke.

PIANOFORTE RECITALS.

So many of these events call for mention that it is necessary to summarize them.

Two of the younger generation of pianists, namely Ernst Lengyel (February 21) and Benno Moiseiwitsch (March 18), have appeared at Bechstein Hall and given further proof of their virtuosity; and two artists of European fame, namely Harold Bauer (Bechstein Hall, March 11) and Emil Sauer (Queen's Hall, March 13) have upheld their reputations.

For the rest, the following list must suffice, with the remark that none of the events failed to equal expectations. At Bechstein Hall: Miss Adela Verne (February 21), Mr. Marmaduke Barton (February 25), Miss Daisy Koettgen (March 9), Miss Lillian Shimberg (March 21); at Æolian Hall: Mlle. Mania Seguel (February 25), Miss Olive Blume (March 14), Miss Ada Thomas (March 17), Mr. Marcian Thalberg (March 21), Mr. Wesley Weyman (March 22); at Steinway Hall: Miss Ruby Holland (February 22), Mr. Alfred Laliberté (March 8), M. Benno Schonberger (March 15), Miss Jessie Field (March 22); at Portman Rooms, Miss Olive Byrne (March 11). Mr. J. F. Barnett's pupils played at the Guildhall School of Music on March 17.

OTHER RECITALS AND CONCERTS.

The programme of the Orchestral Concert given by the Royal College of Music on February 21 included Brahms's first Symphony and Mr. D. F. Tovey's Pianoforte concerto in A major, with Mr. J. Alan Taffs as soloist.

Some interesting songs by M. Moret were introduced by Madame Blanche Marchesi under the auspices of the Société des Concerts Français at Bechstein Hall on February 22. M. Yves Nat (pianoforte) and M. André Mangeot (violin) also took part in the programme, which consisted entirely of works by MM. Saint-Saëns and Moret.

Miss Maggie Teyte and Mr. Percy Grainger provided the programme of the Broadwood Concert given at Æolian Hall on February 23, and, needless to say, their efforts gave the occasion a high artistic value.

Violin recitals were given at Bechstein Hall by Miss Margery Bentwich on February 28 and by Miss Helen Sealy on March 3 and March 14. Both artists showed creditable skill and musical gifts.

The features of the Barns-Phillips concert given at Bechstein Hall on March 4 were Spohr's six songs, Op. 154, sung by Mr. Phillips, and three new pianoforte pieces by Miss Barns, played by Miss May Elliot.

Signor Mario Lorenzi, the youthful professor of the harp, played some clever compositions of his own when he gave a recital at Broadwood's on March 7.

Miss Myrtle Meggy (pianist) and Miss Aline Trewman (vocalist) joined forces in giving a recital at Æolian Hall on March 10. Mr. Robert Maitland (pianist) and Mr. Neville Swainson (vocalist) gave a combined recital at Bechstein Hall on March 23.

A concert of their own compositions was given by Mr. Archibald Hamilton-Rowan and Mr. H. V. Jervis-Read at Æolian Hall on March 16. The former was represented by two graceful trios for pianoforte, horn and clarinet, and for pianoforte, violin and violoncello respectively. The latter was represented by a number of songs in which his serious purpose and musicianship were again revealed.

The Lothbury Male-Voice Choir gave an interesting Smoking Concert in the Great Hall, Cannon Street Hotel, on March 9. In accordance with the custom of the Choir at its Lenten Concert, the first part was entirely sacred, and included Mundy's 'O Lord, the Maker of all things,' the 'O Salutaris' and 'Sanctus' from Gounod's 'Messe des Orphéonistes,' and the Offertorium ('Domine Jesu Christe') from Cherubini's Requiem. The second part contained Weelkes's 'All at once well met;' 'I prithee send me back,' by Lovatt (first performance); 'The Lovers,' by Koochat; a canon, 'He who trusts in ladies fair,' by Eisenhofer; Martin's 'Haste ye, soft gales'; and Horsley's 'Nymphs of the forest.' The singing of the Choir was admirable, and a very high level of excellence was sustained throughout, reflecting great credit upon its talented and painstaking conductor, Mr. T. B. Evison. Mr. Greville Cooke proved himself both a sympathetic accompanist and a capital solo pianist.

Suburban Concerts.

Miss Emily Macfarlane gave her annual concert at Barnet on February 21, before a large audience. The capabilities of the Ladies' Choir were exhibited in Elgar's 'The snow' and other pieces. The chief instrumental item was Bach's D minor Concerto for pianoforte and strings, given by Miss Malcolm Cook's orchestra under Dr. McClure's direction. The vocal soloists were Miss Macfarlane and Mr. Plunket Greene, whose efforts were warmly received.

Mr. Reginald Stuart Welch gave an 'afternoon of music' at Brixton, on February 24, in the form of a pianoforte recital, the programme of which included a movement from his own 'Thanksgiving Sonata.'

A selection from Haydn's 'Creation' was given in Walton-on-Thames Parish Church on February 26. The choruses were sung by a special choir, consisting chiefly of members of the Choral Society. The soprano solos were sung by Master Leslie Durn. The performance, which was given without a conductor, was accompanied on the organ by Mr. H. T. Gilberthorpe.

The St. Andrew's Choral Society, Plaistow, conducted by Mr. F. Pearce, gave a creditable performance of 'St. Paul' on February 27. The chief soloists were Miss G. Merrifield (soprano) and Mr. W. Pring (bass).

'Lalla Rookh' (Frederic Clay) and a miscellaneous second part, including Mendelssohn's 'Hear my prayer,' formed the programme of a choral and orchestral concert given in the Lopping Hall, Loughton, on February 27. Mr. Henry Riding conducted.

On Tuesday, February 28, a concert was given by Miss Christabel Baxendale (violin) at the Public Hall, West Norwood. Miss Baxendale was assisted by Miss Gertrude Bauer (pianoforte) in César Franck's Sonata in A and Handel's Sonata in E. Miss Kathleen Baxendale (soprano) and Mr. Campbell Carr (baritone) also took part.

A farewell concert was given on February 28 at the Hammersmith Town Hall by Miss Louise Dawe, preparatory to her departure for Australia. A long programme was carried out by a number of vocal and instrumental soloists.

The Winchmore Hill Choral Society gave the second concert of their third season on March 14, in the Institute. 'Elijah' was the work selected, and a large audience listened to the performance with great attention. An orchestra played the accompaniments, and Mr. Henry S. Plummer conducted.

An excellent concert was given on March 16 at the Large Public Hall, Croydon, by the Croydon District Orchestral Society under the able direction of Mr. Oswald Laston. Beethoven's 'Egmont' Overture and German's 'Richard III.' Overture were the chief instrumental numbers in the programme, to which Miss Hope Squire (pianist), Miss Christine Scaramanga and Mr. Randell Jackson (vocalists) contributed solos.

The massed bands of the 2nd Life Guards (Lieut. Charles Hall), the Horse Guards (Blues) (Mr. Manuel Bilton), the Coldstream Guards (Lieut. J. Mackenzie Rogan) and the Irish Guards (Mr. Charles Hassell) gave a concert under their various conductors at the Alexandra Palace on March 18, before a large audience. The programme included Tchaikovsky's '1812' Overture. The vocalists were Miss Margaret Balfour and Mr. Gwynne Davies.

On March 18 the Harringay Choral and Orchestral Society of 150 performers gave a performance of 'Elijah' in the Northern Polytechnic, with signal success under the conductorship of Mr. Harry E. King.

FESTIVAL OF EMPIRE.

The programmes of the nine concerts that will form the 'Festival of Empire' organized by Dr. Charles Harriss to take place at the Crystal Palace during the Coronation season have been chosen to represent music by Colonial and British composers. On May 12 the Imperial Choir will take part in an 'Imperial Concert.' The remaining concerts, which are to be mainly orchestral, will represent respectively Canada, England, Australia, Scotland, South Africa, Ireland, Wales and New Zealand. The conductors will be Dr. Harriss, Sir Henry Wood, Sir Alexander Mackenzie, Sir Hubert Parry, Mr. S. Coleridge-Taylor, Mr. Hamilton Harty, Mr. Edward German.

According to the latest Bulletin of the New York Public Library, the entire collection of music scores for circulation now amounts to 8,030 volumes, an increase of 1,111 volumes over the number recorded in 1909. The music scores are distributed among all the branches, but as a rule the larger collections are placed at branches situated near musical centres or where a special demand is shown. During the past year the circulation of music scores was 34,899, an increase of 2,088 over that of the previous year. It is interesting to note that 42 per cent. of the total circulation of music consisted of opera scores, for which there is a large demand in all branches, especially during the opera season. The classified list of music scores now in the library is shown as follows: operas, 3,519; oratorios and church music, 611; songs and choruses, 1,837; pianoforte music, 1,503; organ music, 81; music for other instruments, 479.

Music in the Provinces.

BIRMINGHAM.

The Birmingham Festival Choral Society's third concert of the current series given in the Town Hall, on February 23, under Dr. Sinclair's watchful and efficient conductorship, was of more than ordinary interest, and helped to introduce to local judgment S. Coleridge-Taylor's delightfully melodious cantata 'Endymion's Dream,' brought out at the Brighton Musical Festival, February, 1910. The composer intended to be present to conduct his work, but at the last moment was prevented from doing so. The cantata is throughout of an impassioned character, the musical settings revealing much romantic charm and gift of melody; one is impressed by its vivid and picturesque orchestral colouring, by its fascinating style and musicianship. The part of Selene was taken by Miss Perceval Allen and that of Endymion by Mr. Morgan Kingston, both artists imparting to the music dramatic power and passion of no mean order. The choir and orchestra were evidently in sympathy with the work, judging by the excellent results attained. The revival of Sir Edward Elgar's 'Caractacus' formed an additional attraction at this concert. There were many excellent points in the performance and the choral portion in particular showed adequate preparation. The solo parts were entrusted to Miss Allen, Mr. Kingston, Mr. Thorpe Bates, and our local baritone Mr. Sidney Stoddard, who at a moment's notice replaced Mr. Aubrey Millward. Mr. C. W. Perkins occupied his customary place at the organ.

Madame Clara Butt and Mr. Kennerley Rumford drew a large audience to the Town Hall on February 28. The great contralto was in excellent voice, and for the first time she included in her selection Schubert's 'Der Wanderer' and Brahms's 'Der Schmied.'

The Birmingham Philharmonic Society's seventh and eighth orchestral concerts were given at the Town Hall on March 1 and 15 respectively. M. Wassili Safonoff conducted the first and Herr Fritz Cassirer the latter. M. Safonoff gave a wonderful reading of Tchaikovsky's 'Pathetic' symphony, probably the finest and most inspired ever heard in Birmingham since Dr. Hans Richter first introduced it in 1895. The programme of the eighth and last concert of the season was entirely devoted to Beethoven, and comprised the overtures 'Leonore' No. 3 and 'Coriolanus,' the seventh Symphony and the Violin concerto. Herr Cassirer, who made his debut here, showed that he was a Beethoven conductor of the first rank. Mr. Max Mossel played the Concerto with nobility of expression and perfect mechanism.

The Birmingham New Choral Society undertook a somewhat daring task in performing Bach's 'St. John Passion' at their concert at the Town Hall on March 9, but the conductor, Mr. Rutland Boughton, always aims at the highest in vocal art; and if the interpretation of the music did not reach the level of a Festival performance, it showed at least an earnest endeavour to give of the best. The choir certainly carried off the honours, and one has rarely heard such a magnificent and rich tone from sopranos. The exacting solo work was sung by Miss Dorothy Silk, Miss Frances Jennings, Mr. Frank Mullings, Mr. Arthur Jordan, Mr. William Bennett and Mr. Harry Bannister with somewhat unequal success.

The last of Mr. Max Mossel's Drawing Room concerts was held at the Grosvenor Room, Grand Hotel, on March 9, and was in the nature of a vocal and violin recital by Madame Agnes Nicholls and Mr. Mossel, with Mr. Hamilton Harty at the pianoforte. The last Harrison Concert was given in the Town Hall on March 13, the executive being the New Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Mr. Landon Ronald, and the vocalist Madame Melba. The programme was made up of well-known items, including Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 4, and Debussy's prelude 'L'Après-midi d'un Faune.' Madame Melba, who was in glorious voice, sang an Aria by Handel, the Mad Scene from 'Hamlet,' and the well-worn vocal valse 'Se sara Rose.'

The Birmingham Choral Union once more relied on a concert recital of Gounod's opera 'Faust' to draw a large audience to the Town Hall on March 11. A capital all-round performance was given under Mr. Thomas Facer's conductorship. The principal parts were allotted to Madame de Vere Sapio, Miss Emily Cleobury, Mr. Wilson Pembroke, Mr. John Ridding and Mr. Busby.

BOURNEMOUTH.

There was a disappointingly small audience at the concert given in the Amity Hall, Poole, on February 23, by the Poole and Parkstone Philharmonic Society. Mr. A. W. Russe, the Society's conductor, is to be complimented upon the success with which both choir and orchestra accomplished their task. The programme included Cowen's 'St. John's Eve,' in which the solo parts were capably sustained by Miss Madeleine Applegate, Miss Florence Lovell, Mr. H. J. Travers and Mr. Hamilton Law. The Society is now busily preparing for the Dorset Choral Association's competition festival, which is to be held at Weymouth on May 9.

Special interest was attached to the twenty-third Symphony Concert, given at the Winter Gardens on March 9, by the inclusion of a work that had not previously been heard in a concert hall. This was Mr. J. D. Davis's prelude to 'The Cossacks,' an opera produced some years ago in Birmingham and afterwards in Antwerp. It contains much that is of intrinsic worth, and is very suitable for concert-room purposes.

BRISTOL.

The annual Ladies' Night of the Bristol Royal Orpheus Glee Society, on February 23, attracted a large audience to Colston Hall. Under the direction of Mr. George Riseley, a well-arranged programme was successfully carried out, among the principal compositions presented, being, 'I wish to tune' (S. S. Wesley), 'Hohenlinden' (T. Cooke), 'Oh! the summer night' (W. H. Cummings), and 'The phantom host' (F. Hegar). Mr. C. Lee Williams conducted two of his own compositions, 'The haven' and 'Tally Ho!' The audience expressed gratification, particularly at the former. Another composer-conductor was Dr. A. H. Brewer, who had not before taken part in a local concert of the Bristol Society. He directed his pieces 'There be none of beauty's daughters' and 'A ballad when at sea,' the merits of which were heartily recognized.

On February 28, at Redland Park Hall, the Bristol Cathedral School Choir gave their twentieth concert in aid of the funds of the Children's Help Society, and the Home for Crippled Children. Mr. E. Morrie Tyrrell conducted the choral and Mr. A. E. Hill the orchestral numbers.

At a chamber concert in the Victoria Rooms, on March 6, the Anglo-Dutch String Quartet appeared. The players were Messrs. Arthur Catterall and J. Waterhouse (violins), D. Reggel (viola), and Johan C. Hock (violoncello); they contributed Dvorák's Quartet in F major, Op. 96, and, with Miss Jenny Meid at the pianoforte, Brahms's Quintet in F minor, Op. 34.

At the Shirehampton Hall, on March 7, the Avonmouth Choral Society, under the direction of Mr. P. Napier Miles, delighted a large assembly with their efforts. Bach's 'A stronghold sure' and Sir Hubert Parry's 'Ode on St. Cecilia's Day' were creditably interpreted. The soloists were Madame le Mar and Mr. Davis Brooks. The Bristol Symphony Orchestra were present, and played effectively Schubert's Overture to 'Feirrabas.'

CAMBRIDGE.

Concerts have never been so numerous as in the past term. We have had the sensation of a visit from Madame Melba, for whom the Corn Exchange was specially prepared. It was also filled, for considerably over two thousand people are said to have been present. Among numerous other visitors must be named Messrs. Pachmann and Harold Bauer, both of whom gave successful concerts.

The second of the orchestral concerts arranged by Dr. Mann took place on January 26. Beethoven's fifth Symphony was the principal item of the programme, and Mr. Thomas Beecham conducted.

The University Musical Society gave Bach's B minor Mass on February 10, under Dr. Alan Gray's direction. The performance was generally voted to be a considerable advance on that of three years ago, and it is to be hoped that its success will encourage the Society to repeat the work triennially. Chamber concerts were given by the same Society on February 8, February 22, and March 8, in the New Examination Rooms. The performers were the Grimson and Schwiller Quartets, Miss Fanny Davies, Miss Marian Jay, Miss Hilda de Angelis, and Miss Eda Rosenbusch. Besides standard quartets, compositions by Balfour Gardiner and Vaughan Williams were included in the programmes.

Mr. and Mrs. Haydn Inwards have given two of their admirable pianoforte and violin recitals in the small room of the Guildhall. The Cambridge Choral Society included the first two parts of 'Hiawatha' as the pièce de résistance of their programme on February 26. The performance of the work was creditable to the Society and to their conductor, Mr. W. T. See.

The Royston Choral Society, as a small village Society, showed great courage in undertaking Dr. Gray's 'Odysseus in Phæacia.' The result, however, showed that they were justified in the attempt, and the singing of the choruses was remarkably good. Mr. B. B. Bales is to be congratulated on the result of his training, and also on introducing one of Brahms's part-songs into the second part of the programme. Dr. Gray was present to conduct his work.

DEVON AND CORNWALL.

THE THREE TOWNS.

An event of importance, the description of which was excluded from last month's report owing to lack of space, occurred in the Stonehouse Town Hall on January 30, when the Masque 'St. George and the Dragon' by Mr. David Parkes was reproduced, having been much extended since its first performance last year. The work, set for juvenile soli and chorus, is one of uncommon beauty, with melodies of original yet haunting charm and clever use of characteristic themes. The orchestration is modern in attainment of special effects, particularly among the wind section. The composer conducted, with Miss Florence Duprez as chorus-mistress and Mr. W. Kilpatrick as stage-manager.

Little in the way of choral music has been done publicly during the last few weeks. The King Street Wesleyan Church choir sang a programme of choruses, quartets, duets and solos on February 20, under the direction of Mr. Harry Woodward, with Mrs. Woodward at the pianoforte. A Ladies' Choral Society, connected with the Plymouth College and Manna-mead School, made known its existence by a performance on February 24 of 'The Lady of Shalott' (Bendall), with a small orchestra conducted by Mr. Charles Jeffery. Miss May Groser was the soloist. At the request of the Municipal Corporation, Dr. Weekes organized on February 29 a concert on popular lines in aid of the Fund for the Unemployed. Members of the choral and orchestral Societies conducted by Dr. Weekes contributed choruses and part-songs and instrumental pieces respectively, and solos (vocal, violin, organ and flute) were given by local performers.

During the week beginning February 27, the Theatre Royal was occupied by Cavaliere F. Castellano's Italian Grand Opera Company, with performances of 'Cavalleria Rusticana,' 'I Pagliacci,' 'La Traviata,' 'Rigoletto,' 'Faust,' and 'Carmen.'

The chief event of the month has consisted of two exceptionally fine performances on March 11 of 'Mors et Vita' by the Plymouth Guildhall Choir. Mr. H. Moreton inspired those under his bâton with the spirit of the subject and music, and the result was reverentially impressive and imposing. The principal vocalists were the Misses Caroline Hatchard and Annie Kirkwood, and Messrs. F. Mullings and Jamieson Dodds. The choir, numbering 250, were well balanced; their quality was rich and pure.

Mr. J. W. Newton has closed his first season of Symphony Concerts in Stonehouse. The penultimate event on February 27 included Tchaikovsky's fourth Symphony; a suite, 'Scènes Poétiques,' by Godard, and a Quintette by Reicha, for flute, oboe, clarinet, horn and bassoon. The programme played on March 13, drawn up from a plébiscite, consisted of the symphony played on February 27, Beethoven's overture, 'Leonore' No. 3, Mozart's Serenade for Strings, the 'Casse Noisette' suite, and Jan Adagio for violoncello and orchestra by Max Bruch, finely played by Mr. C. G. Pike.

OTHER TOWNS.

On February 23, Dr. S. Weekes conducted the members of the Modbury Choral Society in Bennett's 'The May Queen,' and Mendelssohn's 'Loreley,' the soloists being Miss Ethel Pascoe, Miss G. Andrews, Mr. John Gill, and Mr. W. Toby. 'Merrie England' was performed by the Torquay Amateur Operatic Society on February 24 and 25, with much success. A new choral society made its appearance in Exeter on February 28, being formed in connection with the Royal Albert Memorial College, under the direction of Mr. F. J. Pinn. The combination will be subject to certain disadvantages, as its personnel must obviously be continually changing. 'The Banner of St. George' was rendered creditably at this first concert, band and choir numbering 150.

CORNWALL.

Mrs. Chris Rawling's Girls' Choir sang choruses and part-songs at Saltash on February 15, and the Men's Choir sang 'Cheer up, companions,' and other pieces. Miss E. Meadows and Mrs. Rawling accompanied. On the following day, the East Cornwall orchestra, assisted by the Calstock Brass band, conducted by Mr. Mutton, gave a concert at Calstock. Mr. Seymour Pile's Madrigal Choir, in conjunction with the Truro Orchestral Society, gave a concert at Truro on March 1. On March 4, the De Lank Choir sang the cantata 'The Galilean,' at Pengelly, Delabole, conducted by Mr. W. Bolt; and at Torpoint 'Christ on the sea' was sung on March 5 by Mr. H. Oliver's choir, assisted by the Torpoint string band. On the same day St. Dennis Orchestral Society, conducted by Mr. W. Juleff, gave a concert in the United Methodist Church, assisted by the choir and vocalists. At Bodmin, on March 8, Mr. H. M. Lamerton's private choral and orchestral society gave Van Bree's 'St. Cecilia's Day and miscellaneous choral and instrumental pieces.'

DUBLIN.

The Royal Dublin Society chamber music recitals finished for the season on February 27, with an organ recital by Dr. Cyril Rootham, of Cambridge. On February 20, Miss Fanny Davies gave an attractive pianoforte recital which was well attended, and much appreciated.

On March 15, the Dublin Orchestral Society gave the second concert for the season in the Gaiety Theatre. Dr. Esposito gave a very good performance of Beethoven's 'Pastoral' Symphony, and the programme also included Hamilton Harty's 'Comedy Overture,' Borodin's 'In the Steppes of Central Asia,' both given for the first time here, and Tchaikovsky's 'Romeo and Juliet.' Their Excellencies the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland and the Countess of Aberdeen (who have honoured the Society by taking the Vice-Regal Box for the season) were present with a large party.

On March 13, Miss Nora Thomson's Quartet gave the first of three recitals at the Aberdeen Hall. The programme included Mendelssohn's Op. 12, and Beethoven's Op. 59. Miss José Florac was the vocalist.

EAST ANGLIA.

A considerable musical revival is making itself evident in East Anglia. The present chief centre of activity is Ipswich, which had earned for itself in past days the reputation of being a decidedly unmusical town. But, thanks to the efforts of Dr. Sinclair, the conductor of the Ipswich Amateur Orchestral Society, and of Mr. William Hockey, who conducts the Ipswich Choral Society and the Male-voice Choir, big steps in advance have lately been taken, and concerts have been given at the Public Hall which would be creditable to much larger centres of population. Dr. Sinclair, an enthusiastic and accomplished amateur, is doing fine work, and his programmes are as well selected as they are performed.

The Choral Society at their last concert once again repeated 'Elijah,' and did it extremely well, with the assistance of Mr. Frederick Ranalow and other singers.

The performance of 'Elijah' was given with the avowed intention of providing means for the production for the first time in Ipswich of 'The Dream of Gerontius,' which will take place on April 6. In order to prepare the public for the production, Mr. Ernest Hart lectured on Thursday, March 16, to a crowded audience, on Elgar's masterpiece. The lecture was illustrated by the reproduction on the screen of the principal motifs, and the performance of salient extracts from the work by Mr. William Hockey and Mr. Charles Holland on organ and pianoforte.

The Felixstowe Choral Society recently gave an excellent performance of Stanford's 'The Revenge,' under the baton of Mr. J. Job, and the Society at Sudbury are producing next month Mr. Hubert Bath's 'The wedding of Shon Maclean' and the concert version of Gounod's 'Faust.'

EDINBURGH.

The University Musical Society's forty-first annual concert was held in the M'Ewan Hall on March 3. The programme comprised Mendelssohn's 'Come, let us sing,' Cowen's 'St. John's Eve,' and 'Six Highland songs,' arranged for solo voices, chorus, and orchestra, by Mr. James A. Moonie, the conductor. The singing of the choir was in many respects eminently satisfactory, for, despite the fact that the personnel of the organization must necessarily change to a considerable extent each year, Mr. Moonie always manages to secure performances which reach a high standard of merit.

An excellent performance of 'Elijah' by the North Richmond Street United Free Church Musical Association (conducted Mr. William Rae) was given in the Livingstone Hall on March 4. The soloists were Miss Kate Wallace, Miss Nina Horsburgh, Mr. W. H. Oldham and Mr. John Burnett. An orchestra led by Mr. James Terry, Mr. J. W. Cowie at the pianoforte, and Mr. Victor Irving at the organ gave adequate support to the voices.

Under the auspices of the Edinburgh Musical Education Society, Mr. Duncan Fraser delivered a lecture in the University music class-room on March 8, on 'The Singing Lesson in a Primary School.' The lecture was illustrated by a class of children, and was evidently much appreciated.

In Roxburgh Street Church Hall, on March 8, Mr. James Dowie, with a choir of some thirty voices, gave an interesting concert-lecture entitled 'Some Old English Composers.' The choral numbers rendered included madrigals by Morley, Gibbons, and Ford; choruses by Purcell; and anthems by Farrant, Croft and Kent.

Mr. J. A. Moonie's annual choir concert was given in the Music Hall on March 9. The programme was of a varied nature and, as frequently happens at Mr. Moonie's concerts, contained a number of novelties. In Stanford's 'Songs of the Fleet' for baritone solo, chorus and orchestra (first performance in Scotland),

Mr. George Campbell's rich voice and cultured method of singing won great appreciation. Hofmann's 'Song of the Norns,' with Miss Clara Dow as soloist, served to show the exquisite quality of tone of the female voices, and Gernsheim's 'Salamis' was also admirably sung. The Baal scene from 'Elijah,' with Miss Clara Dow, Master George A. Smith, Mr. W. H. Oldham and Mr. Montague Borwell as soloists, was given most impressive interpretation, the splendid delivery of the magnificent choruses in this grand old work rousing the audience to enthusiasm. Special interest attached to the first performance of 'Caledonia,' a new composition for chorus and orchestra by Mr. W. B. Moonie, a son of the conductor. The work is very cleverly orchestrated, contains some really fine passages, and judged as a whole its production should greatly enhance the reputation of the young composer. The full orchestra that assisted was perhaps the best ever heard at a choral performance in Edinburgh.

The annual concert of the Choral Union was given in the Music Hall on March 13. The concert opened with Parry's 'Blest Pair of Sirens,' which received a fine interpretation, but it was in Elgar's 'Dream of Gerontius' that the choir had the greatest opportunity of revealing their qualities, and under Mr. T. H. Collinson's able direction they gave a highly meritorious performance. The choral numbers were sung with a degree of fervour and finish which made the concert one of the most notable the Choral Union has given in recent years.

The last of the present season's series of chamber concerts given by Misses Emily Buchanan, Dorothea Shephard-Walwyn, Dorothy Chalmers and Mr. D. Millar Craig, took place in St. Andrew's Hall on March 17. The feature of the concert was a splendid performance of Brahms's Pianoforte quintet, Op. 34, in which Mr. Frederick Boothroyd took part ably. He also played pieces by Debussy and Chopin in excellent style. In the interests of Chamber music it is earnestly hoped that the support given to these concerts has been sufficient to ensure their continuance next season.

In the Music Hall on March 21, Mr. Kirkhope's choir gave a delightful concert devoted to the unaccompanied performance of madrigals and part-songs.

GLASGOW.

The close of the Choral and Orchestral Union's season has, as usual, been followed by quite a number of music-makings by the smaller organizations. Under the auspices of the Glasgow Bach Choir a very interesting concert was given on February 24. The programme, excellently carried out and just sufficiently long to make the audience wish for more, embraced the solo cantata 'Non so che sia Dolore' for soprano voice with flute, cembalo, and string orchestra, Concerto in C major for three pianofortes and string orchestra, Sonata in C major for two violins and pianoforte, and a Suite in B minor for flute and string orchestra, the solo part in the last-named being finely played by Mr. Alfred Halstead. The performance was given under the direction of Mr. Henri Verbrugghen.

The annual concert of the University Choral Society conducted by Mr. A. M. Henderson, the organist to the University, took place on February 28, when a programme of part-songs, motets, &c., well suited to the choir's capacity, was very creditably performed. Among the more successful numbers were Mendelssohn's 'Hear my prayer' and Arthur Somervell's choral ballad 'Earl Haldan's daughter.' The solo vocalists were Miss Jenny Young and Mr. Maurice D'Oisly, and the duties of accompanist were shared by Mr. W. F. Forsyth and Mr. Henderson, the latter also contributing some pianoforte solos. The students of the Athenaeum School of Music gave their annual concert on March 2, the programme being arranged to exhibit their activities in the various branches of musical study. The Ladies' Choir made a good appearance in Elgar's 'The snow' and 'Fly, singing bird,' and in the Spinning chorus from 'The Flying Dutchman.' There was also some excellent pianoforte playing and solo singing, but probably the most interesting item on the programme was Mr. James Friskin's Quintet in C minor for pianoforte and strings, the pianoforte part being played by the composer.

The recently formed Ladies' String Orchestra made its first public appearance on March 3. The orchestra, conducted by Miss Hilda Bailey, numbers about a couple of dozen capable amateurs who have evidently ample time to devote to practice, and their ensemble in a programme which included a Concerto grosso in G by Handel, a Serenade by Mozart, and an unfamiliar Ballade by De Greef, was exceedingly good. The contributions by Miss Rana Taggart as solo vocalist, and Mr. James Friskin as solo pianist, provided the necessary variety.

The Amateur Orchestral Society conducted by Mr. W. T. Hoeck gave their second concert for the season on March 9. The programme included Schubert's 'Unfinished' symphony, Max Bruch's prelude to 'Loreley,' and Wagner's 'Siegfried Idyll,' in all of which the amateurs played most creditably. Miss Lillie Wormald as solo vocalist gave several numbers with great acceptance.

The Orpheus Choir attracted an enormous audience to their concert on March 14. Under the inspiring direction of Mr. Hugh S. Robertson, the Choir exhibited all the finest qualities of unaccompanied choral singing in an exacting programme of sixteen numbers (entirely memorized), which included Holbrooke's 'Footsteps of Angels,' Elgar's 'Go, song of mine,' and 'Weary wind of the west,' Cornelius's 'The hero's rest,' &c. The technical and interpretative difficulties of these were surmounted with ease, and the result was a performance of very great distinction. Madame Blanche Marchesi and Mr. Robert Burnett were the solo vocalists.

The annual concert of the Teachers' Choral Society took place on March 17. Under the new conductor, Mr. Percy J. Fry, the Society has improved immensely, and it now promises to take a good place among the choral bodies in the city. The chief number on the programme was Gade's tuneful 'Spring's message,' and in this work the members made their best appearance, their singing being marked by considerable intelligence and refinement.

Mr. Henri Verbrugghen, the leader of the Scottish Orchestra, has been appointed chorus-master to the Choral Union in succession to Dr. Henry Coward.

LIVERPOOL AND DISTRICT.

Sir Henry J. Wood received a cordial welcome at the tenth Philharmonic Concert on February 21, a welcome which conveyed hearty congratulations upon his recent knighthood. The programme included Tchaikovsky's fourth Symphony. Sir Henry had travelled specially to Liverpool to rehearse the choir in Elgar's Choral Suite 'From the Bavarian Highlands,' which received expressive and spirited treatment. Madame Donalda was heard with appreciation in arias from Verdi's 'Otello' and 'Aida.'

At the eleventh Philharmonic Concert on March 7, the conductor was Señor Arbós, who obtained entirely satisfactory performances of Beethoven's eighth Symphony and Wagner's 'Flying Dutchman' Overture. A novelty was the Suite by Liadow, 'Chansons Russes,' a series of orchestral miniatures founded upon Russian folk-song themes. The composer has been officially connected with research in this direction, and his Suite of eight brief movements presents interesting examples of quaint uncouth folk-music, hymns, songs and dances, which he has effectively arranged and probably beautified. The choir were responsible for Mr. Charles Wood's effective part-song 'Nights of music.'

Mr. Frederic Dawson gave a convincing exhibition of his skill as a pianist and qualities as a musician in his 'Historical Recital' in the Rushworth Hall on February 20.

At the concert of the Birkenhead Glee and Madrigal Society on February 23, this fine body of male-voice singers, conducted by Mr. J. C. Clarke, was heard to advantage in a programme containing Coleridge-Taylor's part-song 'O mariners out of the sunlight,' Richard Strauss's chorus, 'Love,' and Stevens's fine old 'Cloud-capt Towers.'

At the vocal and instrumental recital given on February 27 by Miss Pauline Fischer (soprano), Mrs. Charles Leggatt (solo pianoforte), Mr. A. E. Thomas (violin), and Mr. Cyril Goldie (violin-cello), a performance was given of two movements from Arnold Clibborn's Violoncello sonata in C major. The composer is a young local musician at present studying under Professor Knorr at Frankfort Conservatoire.

The eighth and closing concert of the second series of the Vasco Akeroyd Symphony Concerts in the Philharmonic Hall occurred on February 28, when as usual the programme included items chosen by popular vote. These were Beethoven's Overture 'Leonore No. 3,' Schubert's 'Unfinished' Symphony, Grieg's 'Peer Gynt' Suite, and a Brahms Hungarian Dance. The vocalist was Madame Marie Brema, and Mr. Anton Maaskoff, a pupil of Dr. Brodsky, excelled in playing Bach's Violin concerto in A minor. Local interest was aroused in the first performance here of Mr. Ernest Bryson's Study for orchestra 'Voices,' recently played with success at the Promenade Concerts in London.

With the Lord Mayor presiding, supported by the Lord Bishop (Dr. Chavasse) and Archdeacon Madden, the annual meeting of the Liverpool Church Choir Association was held in the Town Hall on March 9. It was reported that the surplus of the successful tenth Festival held in St. George's Hall on November 17 amounted to £25, the receipts being £287 and the expenses £262. There is a balance in hand of £111. The annual festival of the Association has become one of considerable public importance and widespread interest, largely owing to the indefatigable exertions of the Hon. Secretary, Mr. Ralph H. Baker, aided by a strong and influential committee. Arrangements are now in hand for the festival in December next, and local composers are again invited for the third time to send in compositions which are to be submitted to an independent adjudicator. Sir George Martin and Sir Charles Stanford have acted in this capacity on previous occasions.

The twenty-seventh annual concert of the Liverpool Cymric Vocal Union was given in Hope Hall on March 4, when this excellent male-voice combination of nearly fifty members, conducted by Mr. J. T. Jones, exhibited all their well-known accomplishment.

The Warrington Musical Society's second concert on February 15 included Beethoven's C minor Symphony, and Tchaikovsky's Pianoforte concerto in B flat minor (soloist, Miss Lucy Pierce). The choir sang Eaton Fanning's 'Vagabonds' and a new chorus by the Society's conductor, Mr. F. H. Crossley, entitled 'O Heaven-born harmony.' The vocalist was Miss Dora Arnell.

An excellent performance of Mendelssohn's 'Elijah' was given by the Ormskirk Musical Society on March 7 under Mr. John Ball. In recognition of his long and valuable services the Society presented their conductor with a silver rose-bowl, suitably inscribed, at the previous evening's rehearsal.

A new body, the 'Llandudno Autumn Choral Society,' has been organized by the Autumn Concerts Committee, with Mr. Harry Evans of Liverpool as conductor. After testing the material forthcoming for the new choir, Mr. Evans was well pleased with its quality, especially as regards the sopranos and contraltos.

Preparations for the West Kirby and Hoylake Musical Festival in May next are now actively proceeding. Sir Hubert Parry will conduct his 'Song of Darkness and Light' (soprano solo, Miss Agnes Nicholls), and among the choral works announced are Brahms's 'Song of Destiny,' Elgar's 'Banner of St. George' and 'Elijah.' The instrumental pieces will include a new concert Overture in B minor by Dr. W. B. Brierley, the conductor of the Festival.

Dr. Hans Richter's concert on March 13 filled the Philharmonic Hall with an assembly which paid him enviable honours. At the end of a typical Richter programme, the entire audience arose, and bade him farewell in an unforgettable scene of enthusiasm. The only person apparently unmoved was Dr. Richter himself.

Mendelssohn and his music were appreciatively dealt with by Rev. H. H. McCullagh at his lecture on March 14. It is worthy of note that he was assisted in his vocal and instrumental illustrations by his four clever daughters, the Misses Helena (pianoforte), Isabel (violin), Mary (violoncello), and Edith (soprano).

The Welsh Choral Union added a leaf to their laurels by their performance on March 18 of Mr. Granville Bantock's 'Omar Khayyám' (Parts 2 and 3). They had performed Part 1 a year ago, so that, thanks to them and to Mr. Harry Evans, their inspiring conductor, a complete hearing has been given of Mr. Bantock's great and fascinating work, for great it is in imagination and in achievement. It strikes one as the sincere expression in music of the mystery, the perplexity, the fascination of human existence. Given in the presence of the composer, who received a hearty call on the conclusion of his work, the performance was full of interest. Great pains had been taken in the choral preparation, and great results ensued. Some of the unaccompanied choral effects were indescribably beautiful, and the pianos were wonderful. The principals were Miss Phyllis Lett, Mr. John Coates and Mr. Herbert Brown.

MANCHESTER AND DISTRICT.

The month that is gone has witnessed the passing of Hans Richter from the scenes of active labour here, leading eventually to the quiet life of the Hungarian countryside. At a rehearsal of Bach's B minor Mass with the Hallé choir early in March, he spoke feelingly of his impending retirement, due solely to failing sight. An eminent specialist had been consulted, and absolute cessation from work was prescribed as the only remedy. With the desire, so frequently expressed of late, for the work of the newer school of orchestral music he was in the most sincere accord, but his sight would not permit the necessary close application to the intricacies of modern full scores, as even now the music occasionally appeared blurred; hence his restriction of programmes to works with which he was thoroughly familiar and could play from memory. He had suggested to the executive of the Hallé Society the names of three conductors, any one of whom would be able to carry on the work he was leaving in a manner worthy of the Society's traditions. At this juncture a quotation from an article in the Manchester Guardian has peculiar appropriateness: 'Dr. Richter has been the one conductor in Europe who has made his reputation by the sublime style. The measure of his greatness has been simply that of the music which he had to interpret. No greatness in any man's music was ever a stumbling-block to him. Dr. Richter has that rarest sublimity of all—sublime humour. Others may have come near him in the passion of "Tristan," but no other could unfold to the full that splendid banner of tone with which the "Meistersinger" overture opens, or let it disperse later into its myriad smiles without losing anything of its greatness, or bring its overwhelming climax, without strain or loss of ease, back to its great simplicity.'

In the closing concerts of the series there was nothing to suggest the imminence of his departure, nothing of the 'farewell appearance' order—just the old steady going-about-his-business which ever characterized the veteran. At the first of the March concerts Manchester heard for the first time the selection for concert purposes from the 'Nibelungen Ring' which Wagner and Richter made, after due collaboration, about the year 1876. Strange indeed that after eleven years' residence in Manchester, Richter should not have introduced this noble paraphrase before; and what supreme irony of Fate that his departure should synchronize with the first performances in the County Palatine of those 'Ring' dramas whose glories have been first revealed in so many European centres by this perfect Wagnerite!

The performance at this concert of Strauss's 'Don Quixote' was the third heard here in the past twelve months, apart from other renderings under Dr. Richter in various other North Country centres; consequently the Hallé men are gradually attaining that freedom of individual instrumental utterance which is an indispensable preliminary to a completely satisfactory presentation of the work.

Bach's B minor Mass on March 9 left one with mixed feelings. Richter's monumental style and method fitted the 'Gloria in Excelsis,' the 'Sanctus,' and the ensuing 'Hosanna,' but all the choruses do not call for this sublime treatment, and long stretches of choral fortissimo tone became monotonous. The solos were sung by Madame Gleeson-White, Miss Phyllis Lett, Messrs. Harold Wilde and Radford, the last-named singer being obviously unwell; of the others Miss Phyllis Lett alone succeeded in blending rhythmical precision with the deep feeling evoked by such a text as 'Agnus Dei.'

Contrary to general expectations, the closing concert of the Hallé season had nothing of a valedictory character. Quite a new departure as regards orchestral work at these concerts was made when Mr. J. H. Foulds, one of the Hallé violoncello players, stepped from his place in the ranks of the band to conduct his new Violoncello concerto on its first hearing. It is dedicated to Mr. Carl Fuchs, and to this player was entrusted the task of interpretation. The composer has explored the region of the higher register of his instrument with welcome results, and one recalls no slow movement of the concerto-form quite like this one; it was here that the composer made the deepest impression. Dr. Richter declined the numerous recalls after Brahms's first Symphony, which closed the concert, passing from a scene of eleven years' labour without any fuss, having done his night's work and his duty.

The fortunes of the annual Hallé Pension Fund concert must be dealt with next month. The Hallé executive announce that negotiations are on foot with half a dozen eminent English and Continental conductors for next season, and hope to be able to announce the names at the annual meeting of the guarantors next month; they have no present intention of appointing a permanent successor to Dr. Richter.

Judging by the sparse attendance in the stalls, at least one section of the Manchester public was not over-eager to hear the Elgar Violin concerto when Kreisler introduced it on March 6, accompanied by forty-five members of the Queen's Hall Orchestra, conducted by Sir Henry J. Wood. But if the 'quality' stayed away, the other part of the audience upheld Manchester's fair name for enthusiasm where good music is concerned; and with abundant reason, for a more finished performance could not be imagined than was heard from Kreisler and the band in the Mozart, Tchaikovsky and Elgar Concertos. This concert has fixed the future standard of excellence in Manchester as regards concertos and their accompaniment. The occasion was quite memorable and attracted musicians from the more distant parts of Lancashire.

The committee of the Manchester Gentlemen's Glee Club have unanimously appointed Mr. Robert W. Baker as musical director to succeed the late Dr. Henry Watson.

NEWCASTLE.

On the evening of March 8 the enterprising Orchestral Society at South Shields gave their seventh annual concert. The programme included Mozart's Symphony in G minor, Smetana's 'Bartered bride' overture, and a clever, bright, and effective Rhapsody by Mr. Ernest Farrar, a young composer who has recently settled in Shields as an organist. Mr. A. Adams conducted the concert, and deserves credit for the excellent progress of the Society.

Madame Melba and the New Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Mr. Landon Ronald, provided an attractive programme at the last Harrison concert on March 15.

The programme of the concert of the Armstrong College Choral Society, on March 9, included both Brahms's and Goetz's settings of Schiller's 'Noenia,' Mozart's Vesper Psalms and Magnificat, and some Northumbrian folk-songs.

Owing to the departure to Edinburgh of Mr. E. J. Rogers, the second concert of the Philharmonic Orchestra, held in the afternoon of March 16, was conducted by Mr. E. L. Bainton, a clever young musician frequently referred to in these columns. The programme was ambitious, and consisted of Beethoven's 'Leonore' Overture No. 3, Brahms's third Symphony, Wagner's 'Siegfried Idyll,' and Tchaikovsky's 'Romeo and Juliet' Overture-Phantasie. Mr. Bainton proved himself a careful and thorough trainer and a conductor of insight and power. The orchestra showed a great advance upon previous attainments, and brought credit to their new chief.

NOTTINGHAM AND DISTRICT.

Nottingham has been favoured with 'flying visits' by Madame Clara Butt on February 23 and Madame Melba on February 27; both of the concerts proved attractive and were highly appreciated.

The choral performance by the Evening Schools Choral Society on February 25 was evidence of progress, and reflected great credit on Mr. A. Richards, the conductor. The principal item, 'Hiawatha's Wedding-feast' (Coleridge-Taylor), was ably interpreted by the choir, who were well supported by the orchestra.

The Wirksworth Choral Society gave a good performance of Elgar's 'The Black Knight,' under the direction of Mr. Carl Ashover. The principals were Mr. F. and Madame Godfrey.

Gaul's 'Joan of Arc' was the work selected by the South Wilford (Nottingham) Choral Society for their concert on February 20, when an unusually fine performance was given. The soloists, who proved very acceptable, were Miss Lilian Clayton, Mr. Franklin Pearson and Mr. Albert Farnsworth; great credit was due to the conductor, Mr. Harris. The Collingham (Newark) Choral Society gave a very satisfactory performance of Spohr's 'Last Judgment' on February 23. The soloists were Miss Creasy, Miss Emily Hart, Mr. Poulter and Mr. Undersby. The Nottingham Sacred Harmonic Society's orchestral concert on March 2 proved to be one of the most enjoyable given by them. The principal feature of the programme was Dvorák's 'New World' Symphony. The soloists were Miss Carrie Tubbs and Miss Pearl Mitchell (violin). Mr. Allen Gill ably manipulated his musical forces.

Two lectures require to be mentioned. One on 'Bach's choral works,' given by Mr. Allen Gill at the University; the other on 'Shakespeare and Music,' given by Sir Frederick Bridge at the Mechanics' Hall. Unfortunately both took place on March 9. On the same evening a meeting was held to initiate a County Chorus for a performance in London during this coronation year, but the project did not develop beyond the embryo stage.

OXFORD.

The first concert of the term took place in the Assembly Room of the Town Hall on January 28, when Mr. A. J. Slowcombe and his confrères gave a very enjoyable Brahms concert. On March 4 he gave a second concert on similar lines, the chief items being the Quintet in F (Op. 88) and the Sextet in B flat (Op. 18). On February 3, in the same room, Herr Godowsky gave a pianoforte recital, selecting Beethoven's C minor Variations, and Brahms's Scherzo in E flat minor as his principal pieces.

On February 8, in the Town Hall, under the auspices of the Musical Club, an excellent orchestral concert was given, the programme including Sir Hubert Parry's Symphonic Variations in E minor (conducted by the composer), two Nocturnes by Debussy, 'Nuages' and 'Fêtes,' and Schumann's Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra in A minor, of which Mr. Donald Tovey played the solo part effectively.

On February 16, in the Corn Exchange, Mr. Cecil Sharp discoursed pleasantly on Morris and Country Dances, entering into some detail regarding the dress of the dancers and the distinction between Morris and country dancing. The lecture proved of real interest, and was closely followed by a keenly appreciative audience.

The concert of the term was given in the Town Hall on March 8, when Dr. Vaughan Williams's 'Sea Symphony' and Beethoven's Choral Symphony were given. Considering the difficulties of the 'Sea Symphony,' which the composer conducted, the performance was as good as could reasonably be expected, in view of the difficulties of the orchestral writing. Both vocal and instrumental forces worked hard with the conductor throughout the work, and richly deserved the applause at its conclusion. The orchestra never played better than in the performance of the Choral Symphony, and the choir, in spite of the 'storms that had been endured at sea' an hour previously, braced themselves up and sang admirably.

On March 13, Mr. Harold Bauer gave a concert in the Assembly Room and played splendidly from first to last. Miss Dorothy Crompton sang several songs very nicely between the instrumental items.

On March 14, in the Sheldonian Theatre, the Professor of Music, Sir Walter Parratt, gave his terminal lecture, the subject being 'The Temper of the Age and its influence upon Musical Art.' The present century, the Professor said, was one of extreme impatience; people wished to hear everything and to form opinions upon everything on the spur of the moment. Needless to say, neither could possibly be satisfactorily done. Criticism of the works of standard authors—generally most depreciatory—was on the increase, and would be alarming if we did not keep before us the important fact that this class of criticism was born as a rule of utter incompetence.

SHEFFIELD AND DISTRICT.

The musical activities and interests of the city are now concentrating upon the Sheffield Triennial Festival due in the closing week of April. All the choral societies which, together with the church choirs, contribute their several contingents to the central body, are clearing the way for the triennial event by antedating their usual spring concerts, in order that during the month prior to the Festival the choralists may be free to attend the numerous special full rehearsals which have been fixed. The actual work of choral preparation has been in hand for nearly a year. Weekly sectional rehearsals—tenors and basses on one evening and sopranos and altos on another—have been held by Sir Henry J. Wood. By this method a vast amount of concentrated work has been done; and when, a few weeks ago, the culminating full rehearsals were entered upon, each section of the choir found itself thoroughly familiar with the works to be sung and ready for the superimposition of interpretation and expression. Only by such a system could so difficult and involved a work as Georg Schumann's 'Ruth' have been satisfactorily learned, or Bach's Mass in B minor worked up to the pitch of virtuosic brilliance which it is expected will make the performance of that work one of the features of the Festival. The result is a complete justification of Sir Henry J. Wood's method of rehearsal-planning. There have been but few withdrawals or disqualifications in the Festival choral army; the forces are keen and the conductor is hopeful.

The second season of Orchestral Promenade Concerts appears to have given such general pleasure that a third series will no doubt be arranged, despite the financial loss sustained by the promoters, owing to the low prices charged for admission. The closing concert of the series was given on March 2. The orchestra played Dvůrák's 'New World' Symphony with a higher degree of point and finish than had been reached at previous concerts, indicating a steady improvement of ensemble and collective proficiency. Among the other works played in a varied programme was Bruch's Violin concerto in G minor, the solo part of which was brightly and sympathetically played by Miss Vera French. Mr. J. A. Rodgers was the conductor.

Prior to the departure of Dr. Coward and his choir of two hundred singers on their tour to the British Colonies and America, a final public rehearsal was given in the Albert Hall. The choir were entertained at a reception at the Cutlers' Hall, given by the Master Cutler (Alderman George Senior), and proceeding thence to the Albert Hall, found a crowded audience waiting to hear them and to wish them cordial farewells.

A successful and well-prepared performance of Costa's 'Eli,' given by the Chapeltown and District Sacred Harmonic Society, reflected high credit on Mr. M. Thompson, the trainer and conductor.

On the eve of his departure with his choir, on a six months' tour of the British Colonies, Dr. Coward conducted the last subscription concert of the Sheffield Musical Union. With a peculiar appropriateness 'Hiawatha' was the work chosen. There was significance in the lines 'It is well for us, O brothers, that you come so far to see us,' seeing that Dr. Coward and his singers will shortly be visiting the shores of Lake Superior on a musical mission. A feeling of valediction overhung the occasion, and at the close Dr. Coward was the recipient of cordial applause in which there was a personal note of esteem and good wishes. The singing of the choir was at its best in the 'Wedding-feast' section of the Trilogy. All the points were made, and the choralism was picturesque and well-contrasted. The soloists were Miss Gladys Honey, Mr. Lloyd Chandos and Mr. Herbert Brown.

Among other interesting concerts of the month may be named a performance of 'The Creation' by the Wincobank and Blackburn Harmonic Society, conducted by Mr. L. Chadwick, and a concert by the Barnsley St. Cecilia Society, conducted by Dr. Bairstow (Brahms's 'Song of Destiny' and Mr. James R. Dear's 'Songs of the open air').

LEEDS.

Leeds is, at the time of writing, occupied with thoughts of, and preparations for, Mr. Denhof's production of Wagner's 'Ring of the Nibelung,' which by the time this appears will have become an accomplished fact. One must admit that, in familiar phrase, it is 'more good luck than good manners' that has given to Leeds the honour of being the first English provincial town to produce this great work in its entirety, for it is only by an accident that it comes before Manchester and Glasgow, the other towns where the Ring is to be given. The bookings, in spite of prices hitherto only associated with musical festivals in this district, have been satisfactory, and the event promises to be both an artistic and a material success.

On February 22, the Leeds Philharmonic Society gave a concert at which Sullivan's 'Golden Legend' and Mr. Hubert Bath's clever cantata, 'The Wedding of Shon Maclean,' were given, but, in spite of excellent performances—the former under Mr. Fricker, the latter under the composer—they seemed to fall rather flat. But indeed the taste of the Leeds public, like that of other towns, is hard to gauge, and the enthusiasm which 'The Quaker Girl' has just excited in the Leeds Theatre is not easily paralleled by works of more artistic pretensions. The soloists at the Philharmonic concert were Miss Edith Evans, Miss Alice Lakin, Mr. Walter Hyde and Mr. Herbert Brown, a very capable quartet. On March 8, the Leeds Choral Union gave 'The Dream of Gerontius,' a work with which they are now thoroughly familiar. The principals were Miss Phyllis Lett, who was at her best as the Angel, restraining her natural exuberance, Mr. Gervase Elwes, whose reading of the tenor part needs no fresh comment, and Mr. W. Higley, who sang the part of the Priest with great force. The choir sang finely, and Dr. Coward's conducting, if not conspicuous for subtlety, had great energy. At the Municipal Orchestral Concert on February 25, Tchaikovsky's B flat minor Concerto was played by Miss Ella Child with a wonderful facility, which inclined her to exaggerate the speed, but in other respects was admirable. Mozart's lovely E flat Symphony was played with great tenderness under Mr. Fricker's sympathetic direction, and Beethoven's 'Namensfeier' Overture opened the concert. The plan of introducing all Beethoven's overtures during the season's ten concerts was brought to a conclusion at the next concert, on March 11, when the 'König Stephan' and 'Weihe des Hauses' were played. Whether such a scheme is appreciated by the Leeds public is doubtful, for it savours rather too much of an 'educational' motive to be popular, but to the genuine music-lover it could not fail to be of interest. At this concert Elgar's Variations were quite admirably played, with brilliance and colour, and his charming early Suite for strings was also most enjoyable, as was Saint-Saëns's Violin concerto in B minor, the solo part in which was played in thoroughly artistic style by Miss Alice Simpkin.

At the Leeds Musical Evening on February 21, Mr. Cernikoff gave a pianoforte recital, including in his programme Liszt's curious variations on the 'Crucifixus' theme of Bach's B minor Mass, and the familiar 'Moonlight' sonata, of which he gave a quiet, dignified interpretation. The Leeds Bohemian Chamber Concert on March 1 was distinguished by the performance of two clarinet quintets, Mozart's in A and Brahms's famous and noble work in B minor. For this purpose the quartet party had secured the assistance of Mr. Louis Booth, a local clarinetist of real distinction, whose refined tone and beautiful, finished phrasing seemed to give an additional polish to the whole performance. On March 14, Mr. Isaac Ellis, a very promising young baritone vocalist, gave a concert.

On March 15, at the last of the Leeds Philharmonic Concerts, Mr. Safonoff and the London Symphony Orchestra visited Leeds, to give a concert which demonstrated their fine qualities. The programme consisted wholly of Tchaikovsky's works; the fifth Symphony was played with remarkable finish and beauty of detail, and Mr. Frederick Dawson gave a brilliant interpretation of the solo part in the B flat minor Pianoforte concerto.

BRADFORD.

The event of the month at Bradford has been the last of the Subscription Concerts on March 10, at which Richter made his last appearance in the town as conductor of the Hallé Orchestra. That the significance of the event was appreciated was indicated in more than one way. The Lord Mayor, Mr. Moser, being a German and a lover of music, gave a luncheon in honour of the great conductor, and at the concert Mr. Harry Behrens, as representative of the committee and subscribers, presented him with a silver-gilt casket containing an address, but even more eloquent than these tributes was the spontaneous enthusiasm of an audience that crammed St. George's Hall to suffocation and rose from their seats and cheered lustily the hero of the evening. The Orchestra, too, was at its best; and in a Wagner programme in which the Festival Choral Society co-operated, the performance of the tremendously impressive scene from the second Act of 'Die Walküre,' known as the 'Todes Verkündigung,' produced a profound effect, by comparison with which the extracts from the 'Dutchman,' 'Tannhäuser,' and 'Lohengrin' seemed almost ordinary. Miss Agnes Nicholls, Mr. Walter Hyde and Mr. Richard Evans were the principals. Mr. Midgley's Free Chamber Concerts, on February 20, March 6 and 20, have lost none of their popularity. Pianoforte trios by Beethoven and Arensky, Pianoforte quintets by Mozart and Rheinberger, a String quartet by Beethoven, Brahms's 'Liebeslieder' waltzes, and some admirably chosen songs, made up the programmes, and seemed to be thoroughly enjoyed by the crowded audiences. On March 7, the Old Choral Society gave a concert performance of Gounod's 'Faust' under Mr. E. J. Pickles's direction, and on February 27 Madame Clara Butt and a concert-party attracted a large and enthusiastic audience. The Bradford Permanent Orchestra brought its season to a close on March 18, when Mr. Henri Verbrugghen gave a very artistic reading of Beethoven's Violin concerto. Mr. Allen Gill conducted.

OTHER TOWNS.

At the Huddersfield Subscription Concert on February 28, Mr. Moriz Rosenthal gave a pianoforte recital in which his great powers were strikingly manifested, his reading of Schumann's 'Carnival' being especially noteworthy for its colour and variety. On March 3 the Choral Society gave a performance of Sullivan's 'Martyr of Antioch,' under Dr. Coward, which was, so far as the choir was concerned, very fine when power was demanded, if the lightness of touch suitable to much of the work was not always so conspicuous. Miss Catherine Hatchard, Miss Phyllis Lett, Mr. Alfred Heather, and Mr. Herbert Brown were the principals. On March 14, the Huddersfield Glee and Madrigal Society gave one of its enjoyable concerts.

The Halifax Choral Society, which for this season has been under the temporary direction of Mr. Fricker, gave a most interesting concert. The choir sang Bach's motet, 'Sing ye to the Lord,' with unflagging energy, and a series of Wagnerian pieces, in which Miss Edith Evans and Mr. John Coates took part, were much enjoyed. On March 2, the Halifax Orchestral Society, of which Mr. H. van Dijk is the conductor, gave a creditable performance of Mozart's 'Jupiter' Symphony, the 'Danse Macabre' of Saint-Saëns, and some well-known overtures. Miss Gwladys Williams was the vocalist. The Halifax Glee and Madrigal Society, under Mr. H. Shepley, gave an interesting programme of unaccompanied vocal music on March 11, including pieces by Max Reger and Granville Bantock.

The Hull Philharmonic Society, on March 10, played the 'Eroica' Symphony, a work of an exacting character for an orchestra largely amateur in its composition. Mr. J. W. Hudson conducted, and Dr. Walford Davies visited Hull in order to conduct his Orchestral Suite. On March 17, the Hull Harmonic Society's programme was of more than common interest, including as it did Stanford's 'Revenge,' Elgar's 'Go, song of mine,' and Coleridge-Taylor's 'Eudymion's Dream,' so that contemporary English composers were well represented. Miss Edith Evans and Mr. Webster

Miller were the vocalists, and Mr. Walter Porter, who has now completed twenty-five years' service as conductor, directed one of the best choral performances the Society has given. The warm, emotional character of Coleridge-Taylor's music was very well brought out. The Keighley Orchestral Society, of which Mr. J. B. Summerscales is conductor, gave, on March 1, a programme that had for its most prominent feature Saint-Saëns's Pianoforte concerto in G minor, of the solo part in which Mr. Frederick Dawson gave a very brilliant performance. Madame Blanche Marchesi was the vocalist. The Morley Choral Society, on March 14, gave a concert of unaccompanied vocal music, the centre of attraction being Bach's motet, 'Sing ye to the Lord.' Mr. Fricker was the conductor, and variety was given to the concert by the co-operation of a local male-voice choir, the Morley Vocal Union, which sang pieces by Cornelius, Wesley, Walford Davies, &c., under their conductor, Mr. Sam Smith. The Batley Choral Society, of which Mr. J. Fearnley is conductor, gave, in concert form, Mr. Edward German's 'Merrie England' on March 7. The principals in a pleasing performance were Miss L. Dillingham, Miss Muriel Johnson, Mr. Tom Graham and Mr. H. W. Kemp. A performance of Rossini's 'Stabat Mater' by the Pudsey Choral Union on March 20, under Mr. Pickard's direction, must also be chronicled.

Rubinstein's Pianoforte concerto No. 4, in D minor, with Mr. Herbert Fryer at the pianoforte; Böellman's Variations symphoniques, Op. 63, for violoncello solo, played by Mr. Purcell Jones; and several unaccompanied madrigals and part-songs by Macfarlane, Sullivan and Cowen. The principal vocalists were Miss Viola Salvin (soprano) and Miss Ethel Wilkes (contralto). The choir and band numbered 260 performers. As usual, the Corn Exchange was crowded to excess.

It consisted of Mendelssohn's 'Midsummer night's Dream' music, Elgar's 'The Black Knight,' Mendelssohn's 'Loreley,' and miscellaneous items. The choral singing under Mr. T. Henderson's guidance was highly creditable. Miss Gladys Ashton took part as vocal soloist.

DARTFORD.—The concert version of Gounod's 'Faust' was the chief feature of the concert given by the Dartford and District Choral and Orchestral Society under the direction of Mr. David Mackenzie on February 21. The soloists were Mrs. Colebrook Reynolds, Miss Madge Brown, Mr. F. Crosfield and Mr. A. Howie. HEREFORD.—The Herefordshire Orchestral Society's annual concerts were held in the Shirehall on February 16 and 17. The orchestra of nearly one hundred players, the majority of whom were amateurs, acquitted themselves admirably under the able conductorship of Dr. Sinclair. The prominent feature of the concert was the production of a new work by Sir Edward Elgar, a Romance for bassoon and orchestra, Op. 62. Mr. E. F. James, for whom the work was written, and to whom it is dedicated, played the solo part with artistic feeling and fine quality of tone. The Romance is strongly marked with the composer's individuality, but its full beauty is hardly realized at a first hearing. The composer himself conducted the first performance; the second was conducted by Dr. Sinclair.

KIRKCALDY.—The Musical Society gave its sixty-third concert in the Adam Smith Hall on March 15. The programme consisted of Elgar's 'King Olaf' and several songs with orchestral accompaniment. The soloists were Miss Laura Evans Williams, Mr. Charles Saunders and Mr. Herbert Brown. An efficient orchestra, led by Mr. W. H. Cole, supplied the accompaniments. Mr. Charles M. Cowe conducted.

LEICESTER.—The second performance of Dr. F. H. Cowen's choral masterpiece, 'The Veil,' was given at Leicester on March 16 at one of Sir Herbert Marshall's concerts. The composer's illness kept him away, and Mr. W. J. Bunney conducted in his place. On the choral side the performance was admirable in every way, and the chief soloists, Miss Perceval Allen, Miss Phyllis Lett, Mr. Maurice d'Oisly, and Mr. Frederic Austin, put their best work into the task. The interpretation was highly impressive.

LONGTON.—Elgar's 'The banner of St. George' was the feature of the programme of a concert given by the St. James's Choir under the direction of Mr. J. Bryan. Miss Edith Bassett was the soloist. The performance proved so successful that a repetition was arranged.

The principals were Madame Gertrude Humphreys, Mr. Frank Webster and Mr. Humphrey Bishop. The programme also included Stanford's 'The Revenge.'

SOUTHPORT.—On March 20, in the Concert Room of the Prince of Wales Hotel, the Vocal Union gave their first Bohemian Concert of a new series before a large and appreciative audience. This well-known choir gave a capital selection of part-songs and choruses, and Mendelssohn's cantata 'To the sons of Art.' Mr. J. C. Clarke conducted as usual.

SWANSEA.—On March 2 the Beecham Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Hamish MacCunn, took part in a concert given by the Swansea and District Male-Voice Choir. The orchestra played Wagner's 'Siegfried Idyll' and 'Tannhäuser' overture, Mr. MacCunn's overture 'Land of the mountain and the flood,' and works by other composers. The choir, conducted by Mr. Llew. R. Bowen, sang in David's 'The Desert,' in which Mr. Ivor Walters was the soloist and Mr. W. H. Jones the narrator.

Answers to Correspondents.

CHURCHMAN.—Why not study the Preface to the 'New Cathedral Psalter'? Psalm-accompaniment was treated of in the September number of the Musical Times. We do not understand your query as to suitable hymns.

SANCTUS LAURENTIUS.—It is impossible to judge a violin merely by its label. Obviously anyone can fix any label on any violin, just as Mark Twain's waiter fixed labels on to wine bottles. You must refer the matter to an expert.

H. E. H.—We fear you are right in saying that at twenty-three years of age you are too old for scholarships. We know of no other course by which you can secure free education. You would do well to get all the general education that your opportunities will allow. It counts nowadays with singers.

Other answers are held over, or have been given privately.

THE MUSICAL EDUCATOR.

A LIBRARY OF INSTRUCTION IN MUSIC
WRITTEN BY EXPERTS.

FIRST PAYMENT, 1s. 6d.

The aim of "The Musical Educator" is to supply in compact and interesting form a complete and systematic musical education.

We would especially draw attention to the following names of Leaders in the Musical World, and of the subjects for which they are responsible. The practical value of these sections will be apparent to all students and professors of music and singing.

MARK HAMBURG, "The Piano and how to Play it."

EDWIN H. LEMARE, "The Art of Organ Playing."

MADAME MARCHESI, "The Teaching of Singing."

JOHN DUNN, "On Playing the Violin."

DR. F. H. COWEN, "The Art of Conducting."

Course of Voice Training, Singing, and Solfeggio. Course on the Pianoforte. Course on the Violin. Positions illustrated by Diagrams and Photographs. Course on Harmonium, American Organ, and on the Organ. Lessons on Scientific Basis of Music. Lessons on Rudiments of Music. Course on Harmony and Counterpoint. Lessons in Canon and Fugue. Lessons in Musical Forms, Musical Analysis and Composition. Dictionary of Musical Terms. Articles on the Instruments used in the Orchestras and in Military Bands. History of Music. Biographical Dictionary of Musicians. Articles on Children's Music and Musical Drill. Articles on Choir Training and Conducting. Article on Congregational Music. Article on Musical Degrees and Education. Article on Nationality in Music.

ITS VALUE TO THE TEACHER.

In "The Musical Educator" every section is dealt with by an expert. Its value to the teacher of music is obvious, because it shows the way—at once simple and lucid—in which some of the greatest of musical professors would set about the instruction of a pupil anxious to perfect himself in his particular department, whether it be that of the piano, the violin, the harp, or any other instrument, or of any department of singing.

Add to this its all-round value as a standard work of reference on every point concerning the wide domain of music and musicians, and it will be granted that "The Musical Educator" is unique as well as complete.

TWO OPINIONS

Sir J. FREDERICK BRIDGE.

"'The Musical Educator' is full of useful information plainly set forth. The musical illustrations are excellent."

Dr. CRESER, Mus.D. Oxon, F.R.C.O., F.T.C.L.

(Examiner in Music at Trinity College), writes:

"We have here an illuminative work of great value, not only to the student, but also to the general reader. . . . It contains excellent instructions."

It has been said that British Composers will never secure due recognition in their own country until they compose inspired music for the young. ERNEST AUSTIN has addressed himself to this difficult task, and as a result of his efforts I am publishing a series of Sonatinas for Pianoforte. His first Sonatina in C, Op. 37, No. 1, has already, in a few weeks, attained a large circulation, and I have negotiated to become the sole publisher of his are now ready, and I shall endeavour this year to publish another six, of which particulars will be duly announced.

These Sonatinas are amongst the most useful and charming that have been written by an Englishman. Ranging from elementary to a moderate difficulty, they are abundant in musicianly devices, and provide the necessary technical equipment for young performers. As a writer of instrumental music, Mr. ERNEST AUSTIN has already been accepted as an original composer, and in these Sonatinas he shows a direct and certain power of writing simple and attractive pianoforte music. The technical features of these Sonatinas prove that the composer has an intimate knowledge of what young fingers can do, and what is expected of them by competent and reliable teachers. One outstanding feature of the general technique of these Sonatinas is the demand they make upon the individuality of each finger. The composer's counterpoint is always melodious and frequently humorous . . . while the true sense of beauty and rhythm that permeates the pages of these pieces shows that the composer possesses and uses a rare gift.

Every British Teacher of music should welcome these Sonatinas of ERNEST AUSTIN, for they prove that England has here one of many modern composers who are entitled to share the long worn laurels with the Continental writers. 2s. net each, with either fingering.

SEVENTH AND REVISED EDITION.

A HANDBOOK OF EXAMINATIONS IN MUSIC

CONTAINING 600 QUESTIONS WITH ANSWERS

BY
ERNEST A. DICKS,

Fellow of the Royal College of Organists.

PREFACE TO THE SEVENTH EDITION.

Through the kindness of Dr. E. H. Turpin the seventh edition of the Handbook of Examinations in Music includes the latest type of Papers set by Trinity College of Music, London, in their scheme of Local Examinations in Musical Knowledge.

The work will also be found to have been considerably enlarged by the addition of fifty specimen questions, with answers. They have been designed for the most part after the manner of those set in the Theory Paper for the L.R.A.M. Diploma, and also that required by candidates for the Higher Practical Examinations held by Trinity College of Music, London. The author earnestly hopes that these additions will considerably enhance the value of the Handbook, and render it increasingly helpful to students.

TECHNIQUE AND EXPRESSION IN PIANOFORTE PLAYING BY FRANKLIN TAYLOR.

EXTRACT FROM PREFACE.

In the course of my experience as a teacher of the pianoforte, an experience extending over many years, certain ideas have from time to time suggested themselves to me which have proved useful—to myself, as enabling me to express more clearly that which I desired my pupils to understand, and to my pupils, as tending to facilitate their comprehension of the various difficulties they have had to encounter, at the same time leading them to perceive the most practical means of overcoming them, and thus accelerating their general rate of progress.

These suggestions relate to both the mechanical and intellectual sides of the study of pianoforte-playing, or briefly, to Technique and Expression, the chief matters implied by the first of these terms being the production of various qualities of tone, the choice of suitable fingering, and the best methods of attacking certain difficulties; while the second, which may perhaps be more aptly designated the means of expression, includes rhythm, phrasing, variety, and gradation of tone, the use of the pedals, et cetera.

A Modern School for the Violin

BY

AUGUST WILHELMJ AND JAMES BROWN.

THE purpose of this Work is to provide, in one systematic and comprehensive scheme, all that is necessary for the acquirement of the Art of Modern Violin Playing.

"A Modern School for the Violin" consists of Six Books devoted to Daily Technical Practice, Six Books of Studies for Violin alone, and a large number of Pieces with Pianoforte Accompaniment, the Violin parts being specially edited for the purposes of teaching.

SECTION A.—TECHNICAL PRACTICE, IN SIX BOOKS.

The foundation of "A Modern School for the Violin" is laid by means of a series of Six Books dealing exclusively with the important subject of DAILY TECHNICAL PRACTICE. The First Book of Technical Practice (Book 1A) is limited to the 1st Position; the Second Book (2A) to the 1st, 2nd, and 3rd Positions; the Third Book (3A) to the first five Positions; and so on. Bowings and other technical devices are introduced in a similarly progressive manner throughout. Each Book of Technical Practice is divided into "Lessons" (or Chapters), and each Lesson contains a number of short repeating Exercises on some definite point of Violin Technique—as Fingering, Bowing, &c., with the needful explanations. Included in each Book will be found a complete set of Scales and Arpeggi, arranged according to the particular stage of advancement reached.

Taken as a whole, this section is intended to facilitate, and to insist on, a thorough, steady, and continuous progress in the mastery of the Instrument, this being the only possible means of preparing the groundwork for artistic achievement with all its lasting delights.

SECTION B.—STUDIES IN SIX BOOKS.

Section B is formed of a series of original and selected Studies, in Six Books. Each Book of Studies (Section B) is carefully co-ordinated, in respect of difficulty and range of subject, with the correspondingly numbered Book of Technical Practice (Section A). Thus the First Book of Studies (1B) is written in the 1st Position; the Second Book (2B) in the 1st, 2nd, and 3rd Positions; the 3rd Book (3B) in all Positions up to and including the 5th; and so on. It should further be explained that the two Sections are designed to complement one another, and that the "School" must be practised, not in single Books of Technical Practice and Studies alternately, but in pairs. Thus, Books 1A and 1B are to be taken concurrently, then Books 2A and 2B, 3A and 3B, and so on, and the appropriate pairs are now issued bound together in cloth (see Cloth Bindings below).

THE TEN VIRGINS

A SACRED CANTATA

FOR FOUR SOLO VOICES, CHORUS, AND ORCHESTRA

BY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

"Will be heartily welcomed by all who love the art of music."

—Newcastle Journal.

"The work will certainly go through Saxondom in the wake of its predecessors from the same pen."—London Daily Telegraph.

"Must attain popularity wherever heard and will assuredly be placed among the foremost compositions of this kind by present-day writers . . . treated in a thoroughly artistic manner . . . a perfect wealth of melody and striking individuality of style."—Liverpool Daily Courier.

"Works which have placed him in the front rank of English composers—the 'Holy City,' 'Joan of Arc,' and 'The Ten Virgins.'"

—Newcastle Daily Journal.

"The choral writing in 'The Ten Virgins' is alone something to be thankful for, and, as we have intimated, it is only one of the many musical virtues of the Cantata."—Leamington Chronicle.

"BOW AND BROMLEY INSTITUTE CHOIR.—The hall was overcrowded by an audience that was disposed to encore every other number of the work. That Mr. Gaul should have secured this undoubted popular success with a work far more contrapuntal than any of his former works is a remarkable tribute to his power of welding science and beauty into one whole."—Musical Times.

"The subject is an excellent one for a Cantata . . . a stronger work than 'Joan of Arc.' Melodious, vocal, and of moderate difficulty, and, like Mr. Gaul's earlier Cantatas, will be eagerly welcomed by societies in search of new works having these characteristics."—Newcastle Daily Leader.

"That 'The Ten Virgins' is a much finer work than the everywhere favourite 'Holy City' we have no doubt whatever. Mr. Gaul has aimed at fine outline and telling colouring, and all that he has aimed at he has achieved."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

Price, paper cover, 2s. 6d.; paper boards, 3s.; cloth, gilt, 4s. Tonic Sol-fa, 1s.; Vocal Parts, each, 1s.; Words only, 5s. per 100.

Performed by the Birmingham Festival Choral Society.

JOAN OF ARC

AN HISTORICAL CANTATA

FOR THREE SOLO VOICES, CHORUS, AND ORCHESTRA

MUSIC BY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

"Few Cantatas are as rich in chaste melodies, charming choruses, and exquisite orchestration as Alfred R. Gaul's 'Joan of Arc,' performed for the first time in Plymouth by the Vocal Association in the Guildhall."—Western News.

"Must enhance the high reputation of its composer."—Liverpool Courier.

"The inspiration of a highly refined musician. . . The Cantata is even a more masterly and beautiful work than 'The Holy City.'"—Huddersfield Examiner.

"No more charming Cantata than 'Joan of Arc' could have been chosen. It abounds in delicious music. There is not a tedious note in it."—Newcastle-on-Tyne Daily Chronicle.

"Gives the listener a vivid and realistic impression, its attractiveness being continuous instead of spasmodic."—Bradford Observer.

"The Exeter Oratorio Society last night achieved a brilliant success, and it may safely be said, without fear of exaggeration, that never before have they performed a work more satisfactory to themselves or more interesting to the audience than 'Joan of Arc.'"—Western Times.

"One of the most delightful Concerts ever given by the South Shields Choral Society was that of last evening, when the principal piece was 'Joan of Arc.' We cannot speak too highly of Mr. Gaul's work, which is of the most interesting description."—The Shields Daily News.

Price, paper cover, 2s. 6d.; paper boards, 3s.; scarlet cloth, 4s. Tonic Sol-fa, 1s.; Vocal Parts, each, 1s.; Words only, 7s. 6d. per 100. (Ent. Stationers' Hall.)

The loan of instrumental parts may be had on application to the Composer, and full liberty is given to perform these Cantatas and to insert the words in any programme without further permission.

ASSOCIATION OF MUSICAL COMPETITION FESTIVALS.

The annual meeting will be held at the King's Room, at Messrs. Broadwood's, Conduit Street, London, W., on Wednesday, May 31. The Council will meet from 10.30 to 12 o'clock, and the Committee from 12 to 1 o'clock. From 3 to 4.30 addresses will be given by Dr. W. H. Hadow ('On the Choice of Music'), and by Dr. W. H. Aikin ('On Pronunciation in Singing').

May 31 has been chosen for the meeting because it is believed that this date will suit the convenience of many members of the Association who may purpose attending the International Musical Congress meetings and concerts, which will be held in London from May 29 to June 3. The honorary secretaries of the Association are Miss Mary Egerton and Dr. W. G. McNaught. The acting secretary is Miss Maddock, 22, Addison Court Gardens, W.

Particulars of the International Musical Congress meetings can be obtained from the hon. secretaries, 160, Wardour Street, London, W.

MORECAMBE.—May 16, 17, 18, 19, 20.

This 'coming-of-age' festival promises to achieve a success in proportion to the importance of the occasion. We give below a list of the chief choral pieces to be used as tests in the competitions.

On the first day (May 16) there will be a Church Festival Service in the afternoon, and a Competition in the evening for Church and Chapel choirs.

Wednesday, May 17, will be the children's day. On Thursday, the 18th, the adult competition will be resumed, and 'The Creation' will be sung by the massed village choirs, the Morecambe Madrigal Society and the Lancaster Choral Society, under the conductorship of Mr. J. W. Aldous. The soloists will be Madame le Mar, Mr. Ditchburn, and Mr. Collett. On Friday, May 18, local choirs and soloists will compete, and in the evening Dr. H. Walford Davies's cantata 'Hervé Riel,' Elgar's choral suite, 'Bavarian Highlands,' and his trio, 'The snow,' will be performed under the conductorship of Mr. Harry Evans. Madame le Mar and Mr. Ditchburn will again sing, and the Nelson orchestra will provide the accompaniments and play a new orchestral suite by Dr. Hathaway.

Saturday is the open day, and many first-rate choirs are expected. The adjudicators will include Sir Edward Elgar (if in England at the time), Dr. McNaught, Mr. Harry Evans, Mr. T. Noble, Mr. S. Nicholson, Dr. Hathaway, and Mr. C. H. Fogg. Dr. Walford Davies may also be able to assist.

The programme is obviously an exceptionally good one, and should attract large audiences to this pleasant seaside resort.

We much regret to learn that continued ill-health has forced Canon Gorton to resign the presidency. Mr. Hatch, who has for many years been intimately associated with the Festival, has consented to take the office. The musical director and honorary secretary is Mr. Percy W. de Courcy Smale. Address: Festival Office, Morecambe. Entries close on April 3.

SPILSBY (EAST LINCOLNSHIRE).

February 22.

SENIOR CLASSES.

This competition, which was founded by the late Mrs. Massingberd, still flourishes. It appeals to numerous small villages, and therefore is able to accomplish educational work not likely to be achieved by any other agency. The following villages and small townships sent choirs and quartets: Gunby, Burgh, Alford, Spilsby, Partney, Hundleby, Wainfleet, Horncastle and East Kirkby. Gunby won the first place in the small village class, and Partney was successful in that for large villages. In the class open to all, Spilsby was first and Alford a close second. Eight female-voice choirs competed. Partney came first in one section, and Alford first in another. Of three male-voice choirs, Alford was proclaimed the first, and East Kirkby was first in the sight-singing section. Dr. G. J. Bennett was the adjudicator.

At the concert given in the evening the choirs combined to give an excellent performance of various works, and the winning choirs sang their test-pieces. The chief item was Stanford's 'Elegiac Ode,' from President Lincoln's Burial Hymn (words by Walt Whitman), and Brahms's beautiful but difficult part-song, 'Dim-lit woods.' Solos were sung by Mrs. A. A. Montgomery and Mr. J. E. Talbot. Miss Lushington conducted the choral items. It is one of the advantages of this festival that it can enlist the services of the competent orchestra organized by Dr. Burgess. On this occasion, as many times before, they greatly contributed to the success of the concert.

ALDERLEY EDGE.

February 27, 28.

The programme presented at this Cheshire Musical Festival occupied two days, and was both varied and educational in its character. The one disappointing feature was the scanty number of entries in the classes for Church and Chapel choirs, both local and open. The open competition attracted only one entry for accompanied singing and two for unaccompanied singing, namely, Wesley Choir, Sale (1st) and Handforth Church Choir. The last-named choir was also placed first in the local choral competition.

The following five choirs appeared in the open choral class (test, Bridge's 'When the sun sinks to rest'):

1. Longsight Glee and Madrigal Society (Mr. S. Pope).
- 2nd. Hyde Road Choral Society (Mr. F. Annable).
- 3rd. Longsight School of Music (Mr. Frank Owen).
- 4th. Knowles Green Glee Society (Mr. F. Chantler).
- 5th. Stockport Madrigal Society (Mr. T. H. Dresser).

The Stockport Choir also carried off premier honours in the sight-reading contest.

The male-voice class attracted the following seven choirs, who sang Mendelssohn's 'Hunter's Farewell':

- 1st. Hyde Road Choral Society (Mr. F. Annable).
- 2nd. Sale Glee Society (Mr. J. Cowley).
- 3rd. Heaton Park Social Club (Mr. S. W. Hartley).
- 4th. Salford Male-Voice Choir (Mr. H. Grundy).
- 5th. Wilmslow Wesleyan Male-Voice Choir (Mr. Romney).
- 6th. Hough Male Choir, Alderley (Mr. H. Allman).
- 7th. Stockport Madrigal Society (Mr. T. H. Dresser).

Seeing that the Salford Choir had only been formed this winter, its victory was all the more to its credit.

The principal winners in the solo classes were the following: Miss Ada L. Cowley (soprano), Miss Lilian Smith (contralto), Mr. Sam Fitton (tenor), Mr. John Williams (baritone), Mr. John L. Lowe (bass), Miss Alice G. Shawcrop (solo sight-singing), and Miss Lizzie Sutton (musical theory, junior).

Mr. R. H. Wilson and Dr. Reynolds were the principal adjudicators.

LANCASTER.

February 28 and March 1.

An open competition, organized in connection with the Wesley Chapel, was held with much success on the above date. The Wesley Sunday School infants gained a prize for action-songs. The Skerton Wesley Choir (Mr. W. W. Jackson) was the first of three choirs that entered for the local mixed-choir class, and the Lancaster Orpheus Choir (Mr. A. Dowthwaite) was first in the male-voice choir class. Two mixed-voice choirs came forward in the chief section for this type of choir. The test-pieces were 'My love dwelt in a northern land,' one of the most beautiful of Elgar's part-songs, and 'Diaphenia' (Stanford). Lancaster Wesley (Mr. Dowthwaite) gained the first place. Mr. Bickerstaff's choir was the other competitor. Besides the choral classes there were several solo singing classes which were well supported. The adjudicator was Mr. James T. Lightwood.

It is hoped that the festival will greatly extend its scope next year. The contiguity of Lancaster to Morecambe, one of the greatest competition centres in the country, has to be reckoned with. But as the Morecambe Festival will, in future, be held only biennially, it is thought that Lancaster may fill up the intervening years by organizing a large scheme. This idea, however, would seem to point to the feasibility of continuing the annual festival at Morecambe. If Lancaster does expand in this way—and there is much to be argued in favour of the scheme, one of the most telling arguments being the possession of a fine concert-hall—it will probably be found necessary not to continue to call the gathering an Eisteddfod. The word seems to connote a Welsh gathering on Welsh lines.

SHEFFIELD SUNDAY SCHOOL UNION.

March 4, 6, 9, 11, 13.

This was the fifth festival of its kind held under the auspices of the Union. The preliminary trials and the finals occupied five evenings. The classes included sections for elocution, pianoforte and violin playing, mixed male and female-voice choirs, action-songs, adult and junior solo singing, and children's choirs. The list of entries fills ten pages of the syllabus. We can only enumerate the chief results.

Five groups competed in the action-song class, John Street P.M. (Mrs. A. Clayton) coming first. In the principal mixed-voiced class, Stocksbridge (Dr. W. M. Robertshaw) was first. The most searching of the three tests imposed was 'On Himalay' (Bantock). In the Junior Choir Class, Stocksbridge was also successful over four other competitors. Mr. C. Jessop judged in the preliminary trials, and Mr. J. A. Rodgers, Miss Quayle, and Miss A. Lee in the finals.

SOUTH LONDON.

March 6, 8, 9, 11, 18.

This annual Festival was held with continued success that reached its climax in the closing concert on March 18 at the Crystal Palace, at which the Lord Chief Justice distributed the prizes. The adjudicators at the competitive meetings, which were held in Wandsworth Town Hall, were Dr. F. N. Abérnethy, Dr. J. E. Borland, Mr. Montague Borwell, Mr. Henry Bird, Mr. Alfred Gibson, Dr. G. F. Huntley, Rev. David John, Dr. H. Walmsley Little, Mr. Hans Neumann, Mr. Dan Price and Dr. John Warriner.

The test-pieces, which were the best collection ever used at this festival, entries and results in the chief choral classes were as follows:

FEMALE-VOICE CHOIRS.

Tests: 'Haste thee, nymph' .. .. T. S. Holland.
'The flaming sun is dying' .. .. F. Hiller.

- 1st. Balham School of Music (Signor Coviello).
- Brixton Hill High School (Miss Packer).

(Lord Llangattock Competition.)

Tests: 'Dawn' .. .. P. C. Buck.
'The forest lay' .. .. Schumann.

- 1st. Madame Grace Day Winter's Choir.
Essendine Choir. (Mr. W. Kendall).
St. Gabriel's Choral Society (Miss B. M. Dunn).

MIXED-VOICE CHOIRS.

(The Daily Telegraph Competition.)

- Tests: 'Sweet honey-sucking bees' .. Wilbye.
'Out upon it' .. .. . Parry.

- 1st. Portsmouth Temperance Choral Union.
(Mr. W. E. Green).
2nd. Essendine Choir, Paddington. (Mr. W. Kendall).

The successful male-voice and Church choirs were the Wren Male-voice Choir (Mr. F. C. French), St. George's, Perry Vale, Catford (Mr. Vine Westbrook), and Richmond Vineyard Congregational (Mrs. B. Lyne). The Sir Henry Kimber Shield was won for the third successive year by the Essendine Choir. The south-of-Thames Championship was won by the Woolwich Co-operative Choral Society (Mr. J. Hines).

The prizes for children's choirs were won 'in both the boys' and the girls' sections by Swaffield Road (Mr. O. Roberts and Miss E. E. Watson). In the London Shield Competition for girls' clubs, King Edward Institute (Mr. Lester Jones) was first. Two £25 scholarships for the blind were presented by the Festival, and were gained by Mr. Wilfred Kershaw and Miss Maud Steel.

The chief solo prize-winners were the following: Girls' solos, Miss Martha Peake and Miss Elsie Hamlyn; boys' solo, David Earp; soprano, Miss Phyllis Scott; mezzo-soprano, Miss Frances Hatfield; contralto, Miss Marjorie Matthews; tenor, Mr. Charles Sinden; baritone, Mr. Reginald Lucas; bass, Mr. George Shrivell; pianoforte (senior), Miss Elizabeth Gluckstein.

In a competition for string orchestras a selection from Mozart's 'Idomeneo' was the test piece, and Balham School of Music (Signor Coviello) won the prize.

The prizes were distributed at the Crystal Palace on March 18. In the afternoon they were handed to the juniors by Lady Kirk. Many solos were performed by prize-winners, and agreeable items were the singing of a boys' choir and of a girls' choir from the Swaffield Road Elementary School, Wandsworth.

The Lord Chief Justice (Lord Alverstone) presented the prizes to the adult winners in the evening. The Woolwich Co-operative Choral Society, the Portsmouth Temperance Choral Union, the 'Wren' Male-Voice Choir, Camberwell, the Essendine Choir, Camberwell, the King Edward Institute Choir, Spitalfields, the Vineyard Congregational Church Choir, Richmond, and the Choir of St. George's, Perry Hill, sang. Miss Elizabeth Gluckstein played Chopin's Fantasia-Impromptu, and Miss Iredale O. Tydeman played de Beriot's 'Scène de Ballet' for the violin.

Lord Alverstone expressed his pleasure at being present, and he said that the South London Musical Festival was doing a great work in furthering the cultivation of an art which brought joy and gratification to all. Sir William Lancaster moved a vote of thanks to his lordship, which was seconded by Sir John Kirk, and carried.

It is estimated that over four thousand competitors entered for this festival. Probably some of these took part in more than one event. The success of the festival is largely due to the energy and capacity of the secretary, Mr. T. Lester Jones.

FIFE MUSICAL FESTIVAL, ST. ANDREWS.

March 11.

A Fife Musical Festival Association was recently formed to promote the formation of local choirs, by means of competitions and combined performances. The first festival took place in the Drill Hall, St. Andrews. The first year's work has been confined to the East of Fife, but it is intended that in future years choirs from all parts of the county shall take part in the festival. The competing choirs on Saturday were from Cupar, Newport, Tayport, and St. Andrews. Dr. R. Vaughan Williams was the judge, and he also conducted the massed choirs in the evening.

The chief awards were as follows:

Sight-reading test (possible marks 80)—1, Tayport (Mr. W. Peddie), 68 marks; 2, Cupar (Mr. S. P. Gutteridge), 66; 3, Newport (Mr. Robert Scott), 63.

Test choruses (possible marks 200)—1, Newport, 169; 2, St. Andrews, 160; 3, Tayport, 140; 4, Cupar, 130.

Part-songs, unaccompanied (possible marks 200)—1, Cupar, 165; 2, Newport, 156; 3, Tayport, 155; 4, St. Andrews, 147.

Chorale, unaccompanied (possible marks 100)—1, Cupar, 74; 2, Tayport, 69; 3, Newport, 67; 4, St. Andrews, 66.

The aggregate marks of the choirs were:—Newport, 455; Cupar, 435; Tayport, 432; St. Andrews, 425.

Dr. Williams, in making the awards, stated that all the choirs had done extremely well, and that he had based his decisions more on poetic interpretation than on strict technical accuracy.

There was a large attendance in the evening to hear the performance of the test-pieces by the massed choirs. The pieces rendered were: 'Let their celestial concerts all unite' (Handel); 'Shepherds' chorus from 'Rosamunde' (Schubert); 'In going to my lonely bed' (Edwards); 'Since thou, O fondest and truest' (Parry); and 'A Stronghold sure' (Bach). The choir consisted of 150 voices. Dr. Williams conducted with great ability. The programme was varied with songs by Miss Viola Salvin, and pianoforte and violoncello selections by Mr. Felix Schuster and Mr. Percy Such respectively.

The prizes and banners were presented to the successful choirs by Lord Ninian Crichton-Stuart, and he also congratulated Miss Ruth Skene (Pitlochry, Strathmiglo), the organizer, and the other members of the committee, on the success of the festival.

MANCHESTER TONIC SOL-FA FESTIVAL.

March 18.

The eleventh annual festival organized by the Manchester district Tonic Sol-fa Association, and held under the auspices of the Salford Municipal Entertainment Committee, provided a full day's programme. The principal feature in the afternoon was a juvenile choir contest, for which the tests were Mendelssohn's 'Blow, balmy breath of Spring,' and a two-part sight-test, which the judge (Mr. Herbert Whittaker) acknowledged was a very difficult one. The following were the six competing choirs, and the positions gained:

- 1st. Grecian Street C.S., Salford (Mr. G. S. Smith).
2nd. Tootal Road C.S., Salford (Mr. W. H. Amley).
Longsight Juvenile Choir (Miss E. Fletcher).
Seedley C.S., Pendleton (Mr. J. W. Stacey).
3rd. Halton Bank C.S. (Mr. John J. Ireland).
St. Margaret's Junior Day School, Whalley Range (Mr. H. W. Noble).

Some capital singing was heard in the juvenile solo and duet competition, in which prizes were won by Martha Postlethwaite, Elsie Duke, Vernon Benson, George Darbyshire, Marjorie Yeahsley and Engle Watson. An individual ear-test followed, in which Elsie Almond was the winner among eighteen competitors.

The evening closed with an adult choral contest, the test-piece for which was German's 'O peaceful night.' The entries and results were:

- 1st. Salford Vocal Society (Mr. Fred. W. Blacow).
2nd. Blackley Co-op. Choral Society (Mr. Frank Sherriff).
Sale and District Musical Society (Mr. Alfred Higson).
3rd. Stretford Glee and Madrigal Society (Mr. Thomas Corlett).

'ST. CECILIA' SINGING COMPETITION (FOR WORKING GIRLS).

It has been decided to postpone the usual summer Competition to November 28 and 29, 1911, and the Festival to November, 1912. Clubs wishing to take part in the Festival must enter for the Competition, and must send in their names before October 1, 1911. Further particulars and rules can be had from the hon. secretary, Mrs. Herbert Lonsada, 38, Westbourne Terrace, Hyde Park, W.

NAVAL AND MILITARY MUSICAL UNION.

A competition of men's-voice choirs organized by this Union was held at the Royal Naval Barracks, Chatham, on March 8. A large number of officers and army and navy men were present, including Admiral Sir C. C. Drury. The three choirs that competed were those of the Royal Engineers, the Royal Naval Barracks, and the Duke of Cornwall's Light Infantry from Gravesend. Mr. A. J. Tassell acted as judge, and he gave the prize cup to the Royal Engineers. The Royal Naval Barracks band played 'See the conquering hero comes' while Admiral Drury presented the prize to second Corporal Cooper, the R.N.B. conductor. An enjoyable miscellaneous entertainment followed.

LONDONDERRY FEIS.

This event was held on March 1, 2, 3 and 4. It was the eleventh of the series, and its vitality is evidenced by the programme book, sixty-eight pages of which are filled with the list of tests and names of the competitors. No report of the results has yet reached us. The adjudicators were Dr. G. R. Sinclair, Mr. A. T. Akeroyd, and Mr. J. R. Booth.

GAINSBOROUGH.

A new centre is in fair way to be established in this district. The Hon. Mrs. Sandars, a well-known resident and capable musician, is the moving force. In February a well-attended meeting was held in the Town Hall, in order to make the scheme known and to secure influential local support. Canon Standen took the chair, and many persons of social importance were present. Miss Mary Egerton (of York), who is now the joint honorary secretary of the Association of Competition Festivals, was the chief speaker. In a lengthy and able speech she made clear to the audience the scope and character of the movement, and its educational advantage. Mr. Embleton-Fox, J.P., chairman of the Lindsey County Council, proposed a resolution advocating the scheme, and he was warmly supported by Alderman C. Thomson, J.P., Mr. J. L. Sandars, J.P., Rev. W. Bradnack, Vicar of Norton. The resolution was carried unanimously. The Rev. C. H. Scott, of Lincoln, was appointed general conductor for the combined singing. The first festival will be held in the spring of 1912.

EAST LONDON (PEOPLE'S PALACE).

The entries for the Festival close on April 3. The children's competitions take place on Saturday, May 13, concluding with a concert and prize distribution in the afternoon. The other competitions will be held on the evenings of May 15 to 19. The Grand Concert, at which prizes will be distributed by H.R.H. Princess Alexandra of Teck, will take place on the evening of May 20. Solos will be given by Miss Muriel Foster (Mrs. Goetz). The hon. secretary is Miss Edith Barran, 6, St. George's Court, Gloucester Road, S.W.

We are glad to hear that the prospects of the Aberdeen Festival, to be held on May 4, 5, 6, are very favourable. There will be over 2,000 competitors—a number arrived at without reckoning any individuals twice, as is sometimes impressively done.

FREE CHURCH MUSICIANS' UNION.

A competitive Festival, to be held in London in November, is being organized by this society with the object of furthering its aim to 'improve Free Church music generally.' The list of competitions contains some unusual features, namely, a contest in accompanying a church service, the choir being provided; and a P.S.A. orchestral competition. Judging from the interest and enthusiasm shown already, the festival bids fair to become very successful. Mr. W. Webb, 10, Nightingale Road, Clapton, is secretary and general manager.

DOUGLAS JUBILEE CELEBRATIONS.

In connection with this occasion it has been arranged to hold a Musical Competition on Saturday, July 8. There will be classes for mixed-voice choirs (two sections), male-voice choirs, and soprano, contralto, tenor, and bass solo. Dr. McNaught will adjudicate. The honorary secretary is Mr. Geo. J. Burtonwood, 33, Athol Street, Douglas.

The Stratford (London, E.) Festival began its proceedings on March 15 and was announced to continue until April 1. It is very gratifying to know that this year is a record one in the history of the Institution. It was estimated that 4,500 competitors would take part. We propose to defer our report until our May number.

The Bristol Eisteddfod, which is to be held from April 3 to 8, will in future be under the control of a strong local committee. Hitherto Mr. W. A. Fowler has been the driving force, and all who know him are aware how splendidly he has worked to establish the educational character of the scheme. But it is justly felt that it would be wise to extend the responsibilities to influential townsfolk who are interested in the welfare of the community.

With the object of fostering the taste for music among the working-class the Co-operative Union has formed choral associations in various parts of the country, and on Saturday, February 11, the North-Western Association held its annual meeting in Manchester. The report recorded a small increase of members, and the inability of the committee to carry out certain forward movements for financial reasons. The accounts showed a deficit of £38, which had been cleared off by a grant from the annual demonstration fund. Mr. S. Fairbrother was re-elected chairman of the association, and Mr. T. Horrocks secretary. After the business part of the proceedings, Mr. W. R. Rae, chairman of the Education Committee of the Co-operative Union, gave an address on music, and the Blackley Co-operative Choir sang several selections.

TO ENJOY MUSIC

YOU MUST BE ABLE TO PLAY WELL AT SIGHT.

To play well at sight without the drudgery of years of practising for many hours daily is only possible by the aid of the

EHREMAYER SYSTEM OF PIANOFORTE SIGHT-PLAYING

By a simple but thoroughly scientific process, the student is enabled to play the correct notes automatically at the mere sight of the printed symbols.
The success of the individual student is, of course, limited by his technical mastery of the keyboard, but within that limit, the student will be able to play accurately and well, AT FIRST SIGHT, the most difficult music.

The Course can be taken by students at all stages of proficiency. The practice of the Course occupies only 15 minutes daily for 3 months.

Illustrated Booklet sent post-free.

MR. PERCY PITT.

There are no statistics available to show how often sons do not follow the careers mapped out for them in childhood by their fond and sanguine parents; but, judging from fairly wide experience, it may be asserted with confidence that the rate of mortality of such designs has always been very high. Another and even triter general reflection on the waywardness of things is that a youth may best fit himself to be borne on the tide that ultimately comes his way, not only by studies that have no apparent value, but by avoidance of paths that seem obviously to promise success. Both these ironies of fate are aptly illustrated in the career of the subject of this sketch, Mr. Percy Pitt.

Mr. Pitt's parents were not specially musical. Heredity therefore cannot be said to be an obvious factor in his natural equipment. He was born in London in 1870. During his early youth he enjoyed no particular musical environment. He had a fair voice, and he was always fond of music, but he was never in a church choir. His general education at this stage was gained in a small private school. He had some pianoforte lessons from the late Mr. Fountain Meen, who warned him that music was all very well as a recreation, but was a poor thing to take up as a profession. When he had reached his twelfth year his parents resolved to send him to Paris in order that he might learn the French language with a view to its utility in the commercial career they designed him to follow. In Paris he was a pupil in a school the Director of which, and his wife, had musical leanings, and here he received much encouragement in musical study. He took pianoforte lessons from Mathis Lussy (author of the well-known treatise on musical expression, a translation of which appears in Novello's Primer series) and for the first time in his life he heard a full orchestra, the celebrated body conducted by the late M. Lamoureux. He recalls that at school he wore the school uniform, which made him look like a postman.

After remaining in Paris for two years, he returned in 1885 to London for a few months, and then his parents (both of whom it may be mentioned are still living) resolved to send him to Germany for the purpose of adding to his linguistic accomplishments and with no thought of musical study. Eisenach, in Thuringia, immortalised as the birth-place of John Sebastian Bach, was the chosen centre, and here the youth was quartered on a family where only German was spoken. Although he took no music lessons, he came into friendly contact with Herr Thüreau, the conductor of the local Musikverein, and in this way acquired insight into the working of choral and orchestral societies, and also obtained close acquaintance with much good music. Through Thüreau he was introduced to Count Paul Waldersee, a musician who at this period was editorially connected with Breitkopf & Härtel. The Count was very encouraging to Pitt, and introduced him to Dr. O. von Hase, the head of the great firm. This drift into musical circles induced Pitt's parents to believe that after all a musical career would best suit their son's capacities and desires. It was now decided that he should specialise, and with this view he proceeded to Leipsic and entered the Conservatoire. There he studied harmony under Jadassohn and composition and pianoforte under Carl Reinecke. He did not compose very much at this period, being content to test his powers by essays in the smaller forms: variations, songs, part-songs, et cetera. In this way he worked for about two years, studying no instrument other than the pianoforte. After returning to London for a short time, his next move was to Munich, where he joined the Music School. This was under the direction of Baron Von Perfall, who was also the director of the Opera, a significant and pregnant combination that welded into a unity the objective of two musical activities. At Munich he came under the influence of Rheinberger, well-known as an organist and as a highly capable professor of harmony, counterpoint, and composition. In these advanced times, when all these branches of musical study can be taught by post while you wait, as it were, and success at examinations guaranteed, it may be of some historical interest to record how in this antiquated period they were treated at Munich. The full class course, as planned by Rheinberger, was spread over three years. Lessons were given from 8 (this deserves noting) to 10 a.m. every week-day. Mondays and Thursdays were devoted to elementary work, Tuesdays and Fridays to more advanced study, and Wednesdays and Saturdays to fugue and the higher forms. The custom, which was followed by Mr. Pitt, was for students to attend the elementary course during the first year, the more advanced class during the second year, and both the advanced class and the higher-forms class during the third year. Thus in this last year the student worked four mornings a week with the professor. The blackboard, with its fleeting chalked record of harmonic sins that find an early grave in a callous duster, was, as it always must be in class-work, a constant aid in teaching. Rheinberger would start a theme, a student would be set to devise some treatment, general criticism would ensue, and other students would be called upon to continue the construction. When it was completed, students were selected to play the exercise, which was always written in the proper clefs. All the members of the class were supposed to copy in their note-books the evolutionary stages of the exercise, with its elimination of the unfit and its survival of the fittest. Backward students were deputed to clean the blackboard.

Mr. Pitt had some organ lessons from Rheinberger, more in order to learn something of the capabilities of the instrument than with a view to cultivate its technique. Amongst the experiences gained at Munich, Mr. Pitt values highly those derived from the students' orchestra, which students were regularly allowed to conduct under special guidance. Frequent attendance at rehearsals in the Opera House, and the coaching of singers in their parts, familiarised him with the exigencies of opera production, and equipped him without his knowing it for what has now turned out to be his chief professional avocation. His ambition as a student was to become a composer and perhaps a conductor. He did not devote special attention to pianoforte technique, and therefore his present substantial acquirements in pianoforte playing are of the utilitarian order, and are a sort of by-product of his general musical study. Whilst at Munich he formed the idea of settling permanently in Germany. But this unpatriotic intention was happily frustrated by the wise decrees of fate, and in the words of the song he still remains an Englishman. In 1892 his parents thought it was time for him to turn his budding talent to account. He came home to London and surveyed the prospect. As he had no inclination to teach, there seemed little or no scope for his abilities as a conductor and composer. Yet, as stated above, he had really been exactly fitting himself for the work to which he slowly gravitated. Covent Garden would not have known Percy Pitt if he had been forced to the teaching mill already over-stocked with capable professors. For a few months after his arrival in London he gave some lessons and accompanied and coached singers. Then in the season 1892-3 Schultz-Curtius started the Mottl orchestral concerts at Queen's Hall, in connection with which Henry J. Wood was engaged as musical adviser. An important part of the concert scheme was the performance of sections of 'The Flying Dutchman,' which were to be done in English, and of 'Parsifal' and 'Die Meistersinger,' which were to be done in German. This involved the engagement and training of a chorus. Wood coached the chorus in the work to be done in English, and a young German who had happened to be a colleague of Pitt when he was abroad was engaged to coach them in German. But the latter had not sufficient knowledge of English to make himself understood by the chorus, and as the work to be done was heavy and the time short, it was arranged that Percy Pitt should help him with the rehearsals. Then Mr. Robert Newman came forward with a great promenade concert scheme with Henry J. Wood as conductor. Wood, knowing Pitt's capabilities, offered to introduce him as a composer, and a Suite for full orchestra composed in the Munich days was performed and favourably received. Later, Pitt made himself generally useful in Queen's Hall doings by selecting voices and accompanying rehearsals for the new choral society formed by Mr. Newman, and when the post of accompanist fell vacant he was selected to fill it. His orchestral compositions now and again found their way into the programmes, and his reputation as a capable composer became established. About this time, after an acquaintance many years before, Pitt met Messenger, who held an important post at Covent Garden, and this led to his being introduced to Mr. H. V. Higgins, the chairman of the Opera Syndicate, who soon found that his linguistic and musical attainments were likely to be of service to a polyglot opera house. He was soon engaged as maestro al piano and stage conductor, and later, was sent on a roving commission abroad to find competent operatic artists. Eventually this brought him in contact with Richter, then one of the chief conductors at Covent Garden, and an intimacy was established that has been one of the cherished rewards of Pitt's life. Pitt was occupied as described above for about three years. Then, in 1906, an opera, 'The Vagabond and the Princess,' by Poldini, was selected for production, and Pitt was asked by Richter to coach the artists. Two days before its production Richter deputed Pitt to direct the full rehearsal of the opera, an experiment that was so successful that he was appointed to conduct the performance. This was Mr. Pitt's first appearance as a public conductor, and his success increased the general confidence in his abilities.

In 1907 Messenger resigned his post at Covent Garden in order to accept a similar engagement at the Grand Opera House at Paris. The post vacated was now divided, Mr. Forsyth being appointed general business manager and Mr. Pitt looking after the artistic side, and this is the position of affairs to-day.

Rehearsals for the coming season are now in full swing. As already stated in our columns, operas will be given this season only in French and Italian. In this connection it is gratifying to record that Mr. Pitt talks very hopefully of the experiment that is being made of engaging some English singers for the chorus. Hitherto the Covent Garden opera chorus has been staffed by foreigners. Mr. Pitt finds that the English singers have better voices, and that they are quick to pick up the music and the foreign languages used.

All who know Mr. Pitt's ability as a composer will look forward to the production at the London Musical Festival of his new English Rhapsody for full orchestra. This composition, upon which he is now busy, is based upon folk-songs, amongst which may be mentioned 'The three merry men of Kent,' 'The Lass of Cumberland,' and 'Lilliburlero.' The work is in four sections, but it is continuous.

The following is a list of Mr. Pitt's chief compositions:

ELGAR'S SECOND SYMPHONY.

BY ERNEST NEWMAN.

Like Brahms, who did not bring out his first symphony until he was forty-four, and then added three more in about nine years, Elgar finds that the appetite for writing in the symphonic form grows with what it feeds on. His first Symphony was produced in December, 1908; last November we had his Violin Concerto; and now we have to welcome the second Symphony, in E flat, which is to be performed for the first time, on the 24th of the present month, at the London Festival, and for the second time at the International Musical Congress of the week following. The new work bears the opus number 63. It is scored for a normal modern orchestra, without resort to any of the newer instruments of which some of our younger men are so fond—the sarrusophone, the heckelphone, and all the rest of them, that make a score look so imposing and the chances of performance so remote. The Symphony is dedicated 'to the memory of His late Majesty King Edward VII.' It is in the usual four movements, though the third bears the title of 'Rondo' instead of the customary 'Scherzo.'

Elgar gives no encouragement to those who would seek for 'programmes' in his symphonic works. It may no doubt be taken for granted that his imagination is kindled by what he reads and hears and sees, and that his musical invention is prompted by this in some subtle way or other. So much can be said of the most 'abstract' of composers; unless he shuts himself up all his days with closed eyes and ears in a darkened and sound-proof room, the tone and colour of the life of the world around him are bound to imprint themselves upon his musical thinking; and the more sensitive his nerves are the more radical will
